Vers. 15-18. LUTHER:—The substance is this: Summum jus summa injuria. He who would most rigidly regulate and rectify everything, whether in the State or in the household, will have much labor, little or no fruit. On the other hand, there is one who would do nothing, and who contemns the enforcement of justice. Neither is right. As you would not be over-righteous, see to it that you be not over-wicked,—that is, that you do not contemn and neglect all government committed to you, thus letting everything fall into evil. It may be well to overlook some things, but not to neglect everything. If wisdom does not succeed, you are not, therefore, to get mad with rage and vengeance. Mind that you be just, and others with you, enforce piety, firmly persevere, however it may turn out. You must fear lest He come as suddenly and call you to judgment, as he took away the soul of the rich man in the night he thought not of.—CRAMER, (Ver. 16):—Those rulers are over-just who search everything too closely; and the theologians are over-wise who, in matters of faith, wish to direct everything according to their own reason.—ZEYSS, (ver. 17):—Wickedness itself is already a road to ruin; but where foolish arrogance joins it, so that one boldly sins, divine punishment and vengeance are thereby hastened (Sirach v. 4 ff.).—HENGSTENBERG:—Godly fear escapes the danger of Phariseeism by awakening in the heart an antipathy against deceiving God by the tricks of a heartless and false righteousness; but it also escapes the danger of a life of sin, because the power arising from the confession of sin is inseparably connected with it (Isa. vi. 5); for with the fear of God is connected a tender aversion to offending God by sin (Gen. xxxix. 9) as also the lively desire to walk in the way of His commandments (Ps. cxix. 16.)

Vers. 19-22. ZEYSS, (vers. 19 and 20):—The universal ruin produced by sin must lead every one to heartfelt penitence and humility (Ezra ix. 6.)—STARKE, (vers. 21 and 22):—The wisdom of the Creator has given us two ears and only one tongue, in order to teach us that we must hear twice before we speak once (James i. 19). If anything grieves thee, examine thyself to learn whether thou hast not deserved it by evil conduct; humble thyself concerning it before God, suffer patiently, and do it no more!—HENGSTENBERG:—In times of severe sorrow it is important that, in the suffering, we recognize the deserved punishment for our sins. That brings light into the otherwise obscure providence of God, a light that stills the rising of the soul, that animates the hope. If we recognize the footsteps of God in the deserved sorrow, the confidence in His mercy soon becomes strong.

C.—True Wisdom must be Energetically Maintained and Preserved in Presence of all the Attractions, Oppressions, and other Hostilities on the part of this World.

CHAP. VII. 23—VIII. 15.

1. Against the enticements of this world, and especially unchastity.

(CHAP. VII. 23–29).

23 All this have I proved by wisdom: I said, I will be wise; but it was far from 24, 25 me. That which is far off, and exceeding deep, who can find it out? I applied mine heart to know, and to search, and to seek out wisdom, and the reason of things, and to know the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness:
26 And I find more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and her hands as bands: whoso pleases God shall escape from her; but the sinner shall 27 be taken by her. Behold, this have I found, saith the Preacher, counting one by 28 one, to find out the account: Which yet my soul seeketh, but I find not: one man among a thousand have I found; but a woman among all those have I not found.
29 Lo, this only have I found, that God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions.

2. Against the temptations to disloyalty and rebellion in national and civil relations.

(CHAP. VIII. 1-8).

1 Who is as the wise man? and who knoweth the interpretation of a thing? a man's wisdom maketh his face to shine, and the boldness of his face shall be
2 changed. I counsel thee to keep the king's commandment, and that in regard
3 of the oath of God. Be not hasty to go out of his sight: stand not in an evil
4 thing; for he doeth whatsoever pleaseth him. Where the word of a king is there
5 is power: and who may say unto him, What doest thou? Whoso keepeth the commandment shall feel no evil thing: and a wise man's heart discerneth both 6 time and judgment. Because to every purpose there is time and judgment, there-7 fore the misery of man is great upon him. For he knoweth not that which shall 8 be: for who can tell him when it shall be? There is no man that hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit: neither hath he power in the day of death: and there is no discharge in that war; neither shall wickedness deliver those that are given to it.

3. Against the oppressions of tyrants and other injustices.

(VERS. 9-15.)

9 All this have I seen, and applied my heart unto every work that is done under the sun: there is a time wherein one man ruleth over another to his own hurt.
10 And so I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone from the place of the holy, and they were forgotten in the city where they had so done: this is also 11 vanity. Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore 12 the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil. Though a sinner do evil an hundred times, and his days be prolonged, yet surely I know that it shall 13 be well with them that fear God, which fear before him: But it shall not be well with the wicked, neither shall he prolong his days, which are as a shadow; because 14 he feareth not before God. There is a vanity which is done upon the earth; that there be just men, unto whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked: again, there be wicked men, to whom it happeneth according to the work of the 15 righteous: I said that this also is vanity. Then I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry: for that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun.

[VII. 29. לְבַד is not rightly rendered only—"this only have I found." More correctly, this by itself, or besides, as something beyond what is said before of both sexes.—T. L.]

[Chap. viii. 1. יְשֻׁנֶּא; there is no need of saying of this that it is more Chaldæo; some such interchange of א for ה is quite common in Hebrew—see the extensive list of cases given by the Jewish grammarian, JONA BEN GANNACH. The lxx. read שָׂנֵא to hate. So did the Syriac. עֹז פָּנָיו denotes the sternness, or austerity, of the countenance. Wisdom clears it up, changes it to a bright and joyful aspect. See M. V.—T. L.]

[Ver. 2. אֲנִי פִּי־מֶלֶךְ; ZÖCKLER would supply אֲמַרְתִּי here. There is hardly need of that—I a king's mouth; supply simply the substantive verb, "I am a king's mouth—take heed." It is an assertion by the writer of his royal right to give such advice. See M V.—T. L.]

[Ver. 15. וְשִׁבַּחְתִּי; the conjunction ו here, has more than the mere copulative force. It denotes time, as it frequently does, and also a reason. Its mere conjunctive force is seldom alone when it connects sentences: "'Twas then I praised joy"—that is, when I took this view of things. אֲשֶׁר = not simply to ὅτι, but to ὡς ὅτι, how that there is, etc.; and that this יִלְוֶנּוּ will remain, adhere to him.—T. L.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The subdivision of this section into three equal divisions or strophes, is indicated by the introductory remarks on the general contents, which are found in chap. vii. 23-29; chap. viii. 1; and chap. viii. 9. The divisions beginning with these passages are clearly different from each other in contents; chap. vii. 25-29 warns us against voluptuousness; chap. viii. 2-8 against rebellion towards civil authority; chap. viii. 9-15 against injustice. Since this latter theme does not close until the 14th and 15th verses, it seems quite improper to extend the third section simply to ver. 10, as do HENGSTENBERG, HITZIG, et al., [the general introduction of the first part of ver. 14 is, in comparison with vers. 1, 9, and chap. vii. 23-25 too insignificant to be able to serve as the opening of a new division], just as we must declare the separation of ver. 15 from the preceding, as the beginning of an entirely new section, (HAHN) decidedly inexpedient and destructive of the sense.

2. First Strophe. Introduction. Chap. vii. 23-25. Concerning the difficulty of finding true wisdom, and Koheleth's zealous search after it.—All this have I proved with wisdom.—This, therefore, formed the means and the goal of his searching. For the expression נִסָּה בַחָכְמָה compare on the one hand תּוּר בַּחָכְמָה ch. i. 13, and, on the other, נִסָּה בְשִׂמְחָה, ch. ii. 1. "All this" certainly does not refer to all the preceding from the beginning of the book, as HENGSTENBERG asserts, but mainly to the rules of life and practical counsels contained in chap. vii. 1-22.—But it was far from me.—"It," i. e., wisdom in the absolute sense, perfected wisdom. A partial possession of wisdom is by no means excluded by this humble confession of not having found any; see vers. 5, 11-16, 19, etc. Ver. 24. That which is far off—i. e., the real innermost essence of wisdom lies far from human comprehension; comp. Job xxviii. 12 ff.; Sirach xxiv. 38 ff.; Baruch iii. 14 ff. ROSENMUELLER, HERZFELD, HAHN, ELSTER [and, at an earlier period, also EWALD] correctly consider מַה שֶּׁהָיָה as the subject of the clause; but הָיָה cannot then be taken in the preterit sense, as is done by the three first named commentators [HERZFELD: "that remains far off which was far off;" ROSENMUELLER: procul abest, quod ante aderat; HAHN: "that is far off which has been"]. KNOBEL, HITZIG, VAIHINGER, and, lately, EWALD, affirm that there is an emphatic prefixing of the predicate "far" before the relative pronoun מַה: "That which is far off, and exceeding deep, who can find it out." But the examples quoted from chap. i. 9; Job xxiii. 9 scarcely justify so harsh a construction. The interpretation of HENGSTENBERG: "that is far off which has been," i. e., the comprehension of what has been or is (τῶν ὄντων γνῶσις, Wisd. of Sol., vii. 17) is opposed by the circumstance that practical wisdom alone is here considered, and not theoretical,* for which reason also there can

*[The confusion arises here from disregarding the meditative, soliloquizing, exclamatory style of this book,—in a word, its poetical character. These divisions into the practical and theoretical regard it too much as an abstract ethical or didactic treatise, with its logical and rhetorical arrangement. This is at war with its subjective, emotional aspect, and hence much forced and false interpretations. See the remarks p.172 in the Introduction to the rhythmical version. The most literal rendering is the best, since it preserves this broken, interjectional, ejaculatory style, in which the writer is giving vent to his emotions at the thought of the great past, and how small human knowledge is in respect to it. He expresses it as he feels it, in fragmentary sighs, and repetitions, or as one who says it over and over to himself without thinking of others, or of any didactic use, and yet in this very way, making the most vivid and practical impression.

O that I might be wise, I said; but it was far from me;
Far off! The past, what is it? Deep—a deep—O who can find?

There is strong emotion in the paragogic or optative form of אֶחְכָּמָה. It expresses the most intense and longing desire, but with little hope of knowing the great secret of the scarcely be a reference to the objective cognition of wisdom, or the knowledge of its objects. The interpretations of most of the ancients are decidedly ungrammatical, as of the Septuagint (μακρὰν ὑπὲρ ὃ ἦν), Vulgate (multo magis quam erat), LUTHER ("It is far off, what will it be?"); thus also is that of KÖSTER ("It is far off, what is that"), and so many others.—And exceeding deep.—Lit., "deep, deep." The repetition of עָמֹק expresses the superlative idea (EWALD, Lehrbuch, § 303 c). Deep signifies difficult to be fathomed, comp. Prov. xx. 5, and especially Job xi. 8, where the Divine doing and the Divine government are declared to be the absolute limit of all wisdom, or as "deeper than hell;" see also Ps. cxxxix. 8; Rom. xi. 33. Ver. 25. I applied mine heart.—Lit., "I turned, I and my heart,"—a figure similar to that in Acts xv. 28: ἔδοξεν τῷ πνεύματι ἁγίῳ καὶ ἡμῖν; comp. also the Song of Solomon v. 2. That the heart also participated in the turning, shows it to be no thoughtless action, but one resting on deep reflection. The simple סַבּוֹתִי does not express a return from a path formerly followed, but now perceived to be an erroneous one (HITZIG's view). It is different with וְסַבּוֹתִי, "then I turned," chap. ii. 20, which clearly marks the entrance into a path entirely new, whilst in this passage nothing is affirmed but the transition from a superficial to a deeper and more solicitous searching after wisdom. Comp. HENGSTENBERG and VAIHINGER on this passage, which latter correctly gives the connection thus: "Although wisdom in its fullness is unsearchable and unattainable, I did not refrain from searching after an insight into the relations of things, in order to learn the causes of the want of moral perfection; I wished, however, in learning wisdom, to learn also its counterpart, and thus to see that iniquity is every where folly."—To know, and to search, and to seek out wisdom, etc.—The two accusatives, wisdom and reason, belong only to the last of the three infinitives (בַּקֵּשׁ), before which לְ is left out, in order to separate it externally from the two preceding ones. חֶשְׁבּוֹן is here, as in ver. 27, "reason, calculation," a result of the activity of the judgment in examining and judging of the relations of practical life, therefore equivalent to insight, practical sagacity and knowledge of life. VAIHINGER's interpretation of חָכְמָה וְחֶשְׁבּוֹן in the sense of "wisdom as calculation," is unnecessary, and indeed in direct contradiction to the construction in the following clause. The copula also in viii. 2 does not express the explanatory sense of the expression, "and indeed."—And to know the wickedness of folly, and even of foolishness and madness.—(ZÖCKLER: "wickedness as folly, foolishness as madness"). That this is to be thus translated is proved by the absence of the article * before the second accusative. Comp.

long past, much less of the far stretching future. The interjections used in rendering really inhere in the style. What should we think of an attempt to lay off YOUNG's Night Thoughts in "strophes of the practical and the theoretical?" And yet it is fully as capable of such divisions as this most emotional poem of Koheleth. In the Hebrew, רָחוֹק is accentually joined with מַה שֶּׁהָיָה, but it is rhythmical rather than logical, and would not prevent מַה from being an interrogative pronoun: מַה אשר היה, "what—that which was?" or, "that which was, what is it?" As though he had been going to say merely, "far off the past," but the emotion throws it into the more broken or exclamatory utterance, and then he adds: "and deep—deep—who can find it?" The מִי as personal interrogative, corresponds to the general interrogative מַה.

In the expression, "O let me be wise," we have at once suggested to us the passage 1 Kings iii. 5–14, Solomon's dream at Gibeon, the Lord's appearing unto him, and his earnest prayer for a לֵב חָכָם "a wise and understanding heart." With all his errors the love of wisdom (φιλοσοφία and θεοσοφία) had been a passion from his earliest youth,—wisdom speculative as well as practical,—wisdom not only "to govern so great a people," and to "discern," ethically, "between good and evil," but to understand, if it were possible, the ways of God, and the great problem of humanity. Rightly considered, this strong desire, thus expressed, is a special mark of the Solomonic authorship. "O let me be wise, I said." He said it in his dream at Gibeon.

"Deep—deep—O who shall find it!" Like other passages of Scripture, this is capable of an ever expanding sense. We may think of the earthly past, so much of it historically unknown; but the style of thought in Koheleth carries the mind still farther back to the great past "before the earth was" (Prov. viii. 23),—to the עולמי עלמים πρὸ τῶν αἰώνων, 1 Cor. ii. 7, "before the ages of ages," or worlds of worlds. There are two views here that may be pronounced exceeding narrow. The one is that of the Scriptural interpreter who recognizes no higher chronology to the whole universe than a few thousand of our sun-measured years. To this he adds six solar days, and then slides off into a blank antepast eternity, a chronological nothingness, we may say, where Deity dwelt, had ever dwelt, ἄχρονος, without time, without creative manifestation—all worlds, whether of space or time, and all ranks of existence below the Divine, having had their origination in this single week (as measured by earthly revolutions) that he assigns to them. The other view, still more narrow—for it is an infinite narrowness—is the one held by some modern thinkers of high repute. It is that of an eternal physical development, or evolution, carried on through an infinite past of duration, ever evolving progressively, and yet with nothing more or higher evolved, ever evolved, than the very finite and imperfect state of things we now behold,—man the highest product of this eternal evolution that has ever been reached in any part of the universe,—man as yet the "etre supreme,"—man, too, lately evolved, or within a few thousand years, from some of the animal classes just below him. All before is a descending inclined plane, with an uninterrupted evenness, and an infinitesimal angle, falling away lower and still lower forevermore, in the infinite retrocession from the present advanced state of things!!

In contradistinction to the meagre poverty of both these views stands the Scriptural malkuth kol olamim (Ps. cxlv. 13) βασιλεια τῶν αἰώνων (1 Tim. i. 17)—a kingdom of all eternities, with its ages of ages, its worlds of worlds, its ascending orders of being, its mighty dispensations embracing all grades of evolution in the physical, and an unimaginable variety in the holy administrations of Him who styles Himself Jehovah tsebaoth, the Lord of hosts. This alone leaves the mind free in its speculative roamings, allowing it to compete with any philosophy in this respect, whilst binding it ever to an adoring recognition of the one absolute and infinite personality, "according to whose will all things are, and were, created."

The Targum explains מה שהיה here of the great unknown past, regarding it as equally mysterious with the secrets of the unknown future: "It is too far off for the sons of men to know that which was from the days of eternity." RASHI and ABEN EZRA give substantially the same interpretation, with a like reference to the creation and the creative times: "What is above, what is below, what is before, what is after,—it is deep, deep, too deep for our power to think." The impassioned impressiveness of Koheleth's language amply justifies such a style of interpretation.—T. L.]

*[ZÖCKLER's rendering, "wickedness as folly, foolishness as madness," weakens the sense. It is more impassioned without the conjunctions, or any other particles to break its earnest and hurried style: "wickedness, presumption [stubbornness, as כֶּסֶל may mean], yea, stupidity, madness," all given in a running list:

To seek out wisdom, reason,—sin to know—

for this construction EWALD, § 284 b, and for the sentence, i. 17; ii. 12 f.; x. 13.

3. First Strophe. Continuation and Conclusion. Vers. 26–29. A warning concerning an unchaste woman and her seductive arts. HENGSTENBERG, following older writers [and thus SEB. SCHMID, MICHAEL., LAMPE, J. LANGE, STARKE, etc.) maintains that this harlot is an ideal personage, the false wisdom of the heathen; but that she is a representative of the female sex in general in its worst aspect, appears to be incontrovertible from vers. 28 and 29, where women in general are represented as the more corrupt portion of humanity, corresponding with Sirach xxv. 24; 1 Tim. ii. 12-15. And as parallels to this passage we find above all those warnings of the Proverbs of Solomon against the "harlot" or "strange woman," i. e., against unchaste intercourse with women in general; comp. Prov. ii. 16 ff.; v. 2 ff.: vii. 5 ff.; xxii. 14; xxiii. 27. And quite as arbitrary as the idealizing of this lascivious woman into the abstract idea of "false wisdom," is the view of HITZIG, namely, that therein allusion is made to a definite historical person, Agathoclea, mistress of Ptolemy Philopater.—And I find more bitter than death.—For this figure comp. 1 Sam. xv. 32; Sirach xxviii. 25; xli. 1; also Prov. v. 4, etc.—The woman whose heart is snares and nets.—אֲשֶׁר is to be connected with the suffix in לִבָּהּ and הִיא is to be regarded as copula between subject and predicate, which here emphatically precedes. In the comparison of the heart of the harlot to "snares and nets," and her hands to "bands," we naturally think, in the first instance, of her words and looks (as expressions of the thoughts of her heart), and, in the second, of voluptuous embraces.—Whoso pleaseth God shall escape from her.—Lit. "He who is good in the sight of God." Comp. ii. 26. The meaning is here as there, the God-fearing and just man, the contrary of חוֹטֵא or sinner, who by her (בָּהּ) i. e., by the nets and snares of her heart, and by her loose seductive arts, is caught. Ver. 27. Behold, this have I found, saith the Preacher.—Notwithstanding chap. i. 1; ii. 12; xii. 9, where קֹהֶלֶת is without the article, we must still read here אָמַר הַקֹּהֶלֶת (comp. xii. 8) and not אָמְרָה קֹהֶלֶת; for the word קֹהֶלֶת is every where else used as masculine, and the author cannot wish to express a significant contrast between the preaching wisdom and the amorous woman, since the expression, "saith the Preacher," is here, as in those other passages, a mere introductory formula (though HENGSTENBERG thinks otherwise).—Counting one by one—namely, considering, reflecting. Lit., "one to the other," i. e., adding, arranging. The words are adverbially used, as in the phrase פָּנִים אֶל פָּנִים Gen. xxxii. 31.—To find out the account.—[חֶשְׁבּוֹן as in ver. 25], giving the result of this action of arranging one after the other. This did not consist in comparison between woman and death, but in a summing up of those unfavorable observations concerning her which necessitates the final judgment, namely, that she is "more bitter than death." The whole verse clearly refers to the foregoing, and does not, therefore, serve as an introduction to the contents of vers. 28, 29, as HAHN and several older authors contend, who begin a new section with this verse. There is rather a certain break immediately before ver. 28, as the words אֲשֶׁר עוֹד בִּקְשָׁה וגו׳ at the beginning of this verse show. Ver. 28. Which yet my soul seeketh.—The soul is represented as seeking, to indicate how much this seeking was a matter of the heart to the preacher; comp. the address: "thou whom my soul loveth," Song of Sol. i. 17; iii. 1 ff. The "finding not" is then again attributed to the first person: "and that which I found not."—One man among a thousand have I found—i. e., among a thousand of the human race, I found, indeed, one righteous one, one worthy of the name of man, and corresponding to the idea of humanity. אָדָם here stands for אִישׁ as, in the Greek, ἄνθρωπος for ἀνήρ. For the expression "one among a thousand" [lit., out of a thousand] comp. Job ix. 3; xxxiii. 23; but for the sentence, ver. 20 above, and Job xiv. 5; Micah vii. 2, etc. The hereditary corruption of the entire human race is here as much presupposed as in the parallel passages; for Koheleth will hardly recognize the one righteous man that he found among a thousand as absolutely righteous, and therefore as אָדָם in the primeval, pure and ideal sense of the first man before the fall.—But a woman among all these have I not found. That is, one worthy of the name אִשָּׁה, in the primeval ideal sense of Gen. ii. 22-25, I did not find among all that thousand, which presented me at least one proper man. That he never found such a one, consequently that he considered the whole female sex as vicious and highly corrupt, cannot possibly be his opinion, as appears from ver. 29, as also in chap. ix. 9. (See the praise of noble women in other documents of the Chokmah literature, as Prov. v. 19; xviii. 22; xxxi. 10 f.; Ps. cxxviii. ff.). But that moral excellence among women, taken as a whole, is much more rarely found than among men, that sin reigns more uncontrolled among the former than the latter, and in the form of moral weakness and proneness to temptation, as well as in the inclination to seduce, to deceive and ensnare—such is clearly the sense of this passage, a sense that harmonizes with Gen. iii. 16; Sirach xxv. 24; 2 Cor. xi. 3; 1 Tim. ii. 12 ff., as also with numerous other extra-biblical passages. Comp. also these sentences from the Talmud: "It is better to follow a lion than a woman;"—"Who follows the counsel of his wife arrives at hell;"—"The mind of women is frivolous;" also the Greek maxims: θάλασσα καὶ πῦρ καὶ γυνὴ κακὰ τρία;—ὅπου γυναῖκες εἰσι πάντ' ἐκεῖ κακά. Compare also the following Proverb from the Arabic of MEIDANI; "Women are the snares of Satan," etc. (Comp. WOHLFARTH, KNOBEL and VAIHINGER on this passage).—Ver. 29. Lo, this only have I found. לְבַד, "alone, only" (an adverb as in Isa. xxvi. 13), here serving to introduce a remark intended as a restriction of what precedes.* The fact of the universal sinful corruption of man, expressed indirectly in ver. 28, is here to be so far restricted that this corruption is not to be considered as innate in humanity through a divine agency, but as brought into the world by man's own guilt.—That God hath made man upright. יָשָׁר, upright, good, integer; comp. Gen. i. 26 f.; v. 1; ix. 6; Wisdom ii. 23.—But they have sought out many inventions. חִשְּׁבֹנוֹת are not "useless subtleties," (EWALD), but, as the contrast to the idea of יָשָׁר teaches us: malæ artes, tricks, evil artifices, conceits.

4. Second strophe, Introduction, chap. viii. 1.—Of the rarity and preciousness of wisdom.—Who is as the wise man? This is no triumphant question, induced, or occasioned by that lucky finding in the last verse of the preceding chapter (HITZIG), but simply an introduction to what follows, by which true wisdom is to be declared a rare treasure of difficult attainment, just as in chap. vii. 23; viii. 16 f.—In כְּהֶחָכָם, the usually contracted form כֶּחָכָם is again expanded, in accordance with a custom often occurring in later authors;† comp. Ezek. xl. 25; xlvii. 22; 2 Chron. x. 7; xxv. 10, etc.—And who knoweth the interpretation of a thing; ZÖCKLER, "of the word," (דָּבָר)‡ namely, of the following assertion, which emphasizes the great work of wisdom according to its influence on the physical well-being and morally just demeanor of men. פֵּשֶׁר, a Chaldaic word§ (comp. Dan. ii. 4 ff., 24 ff.; iv. 6, 15), holding the same relation to the synonymous פִּתְרוֹן as יֹתֵר to יִתְרוֹן.—A man's wisdom maketh his face to shine. That is, it imparts to him a cheerful soul, and this on account of the fortunate and satisfactory relations into which it places him. The same figure is found in Numb. vi. 25; Ps. iv. 7; Job xxix. 24.—And the boldness of his face shall be changed. עֹז פָּנָיו is to be explained without doubt according to expressions הֵעֵז פָּנִים, Prov. vii. 13; xxi. 89; or עַז־פָּנִים Deut. xxviii. 50; Dan. viii. 23, and signifies, therefore, that repulsive harshness and stiffness of the features which are a necessary result of a coarse, unamiable, and selfish heart (not exactly "boldness," as DÖDERLEIN, DE WETTE, and GESENIUS translate, or "displeasure," as KNOBEL, GRIMM, and VAIHINGER). It is therefore the civilizing, softening and morally refining influence of true wisdom on the soul of man, that the author has in view, and which, according to the question in the beginning of the verse, he describes as something mysterious and in need of explanation, and which he explains, partly at least, by the subsequent precepts regarding wise conduct in a civil sphere. EWALD's comprehension of the passage is in sense not materially different from ours: "And the brightness of his countenance is doubled"—but this is in opposition to the usual signification of עֹז as well as that of שָׁנָה, which can hardly be rendered "to double." The explanations of the Septuagint, resting on a different punctuation, יְשֻׂנָּא instead of יְשֻׁנֶּא give a widely different sense ἀναιδὴς προσώπῳ αὐτοῦ μισηθήσεται, which gave rise to that of LUTHER: "But he who is bold, is malignant;" and HITZIG, in conjunction with ZIRKEL (and the Vulgate) reads יְשַׁנֵּא and thus obtains the sense, "and boldness disfigureth the countenance." But the word עֹז alone hardly means "boldness," and the change adopted in the punctuation appears the more unnecessary since the sense resulting from it brings the assertion in the last clause into contrast with the one before it, which is in decided opposition to the connection.

5. Second strophe. Continuation. Vers. 2-4. A proper demeanor towards kings the first means of realizing true wisdom.—I counsel thee to keep the king's commandment. To אֲנִי supply אָמַרְתִּי or אֹמֵר, a somewhat harsh ellipse,* for which however we may quote parallels in Isa. v. 9; Jer. xx. 10, and elsewhere. Therefore it is unnecessary, with HITZIG, to punctuate שֹׁמֵר "I keep the king's commandment" (thus the Vulgate). That שׁוֹמֵר stands in ver. 5 below in scriptio plena would form no valid objection against the allowableness of this change of the imperative into the participle; for שֹׁמֵר is also found in chap. xi. 4. But, as ELSTER correctly observes: "it would be surprising if Koheleth did not appear here in his usual manner as a teacher who admonishes others, but only as announcing what he has laid down as a principle to himself." "To regard the mouth of the king" means of course, to render obedience to his commands; comp. Gen. xlv. 21; Ex. xvii. 1; Job xxxix. 27, etc.—And that in regard of the oath of God, which thou hast vowed to him, the King. The duty of obedience to worldly authority is here insisted on with reference to loyalty towards God, the heavenly witness to the vow made to the king; comp. Matt. xxii. 21; Rom. xiii. 1-7; 1 Pet.

†[This is undoubtedly meant as proof of the late authorship of Koheleth, but it amounts to no more than this, namely, that the old manuscript of Ecclesiastes, whose copies have come down to us, was made by a scribe writing from the ear as another read aloud, in consequence of which he has sometimes given in full a letter known to exist etymologically, though lost in sound, as in this case; whilst, on the other hand, and more frequently, he has given it as abbreviated in sound, like שֶׁ for אֲשֶׁר, or אִלּוּ for אִם לוּ, though generally written in the full old etymological form; and again, in other cases, he has written a like sounding letter in place of the true one, as שכלות for סכלות, and other similar cases. The same remark is applicable to Ezekiel, and the very instances that ZÖCKLER quotes. They are evidences of late chirography in manuscripts, but are little to be relied on as proofs, or disproofs, of original authorship.—T. L.]

‡[This would require the article, or the demonstrative pronoun, or both: הדבר הזה.—T. L.]

§[No more Chaldaic than it is Hebrew. It is merely a variation of orthography for the like sounding word פתר, Gen. xl. 8. Who knows how early the change to the sibilant took place? as there are no other examples of either form between Moses and Solomon, or between Solomon and Daniel?—T. L.]

ii. 13-17. These New Testament parallels should have prevented HENGSTENBERG from endeavoring to cause the "king" to mean the heavenly King Jehovah, because nominally, "the obedience to the heathen lords of the O. T. in general was not enjoined as a religious duty,"—a remark that is in direct contradiction with passages like Prov. xvi. 10-15; Isa. xlv. 1 ff.; Jer. xxvii. 12, 13; xxix. 5-7; Ezek. xvii. 12 ff. The conjunction וְ in וְעַל is not "and indeed," but "also," adding the remembrance of the assumed oath as an additional motive to the one already contained in the precept. The "oath of God" is an oath made with an appeal to God as witness (Ex. xxii. 10; 2 Sam. xxi. 7; 1 Kings ii. 43), and here especially such an oath of fidelity to the sovereign, sworn in the presence of God (comp. 2 Kings xi. 17; Ezek. xvii. 12 ff.).—Ver. 3. Be not hasty to go out of his sight. The first verb only serves to express an adverbial qualification of the second. The hasty going out from the king is not to indicate an apostacy from him, or a share in rebellious movements (KNOBEL, VAIHINGER), but simply the timid or unsatisfactory withdrawal from his presence, in case he is unfavorably inclined; it is directly the opposite of the "standing" forbidden in the subsequent clause. HITZIG's opinion, that the king is considered as an unclean heathen, and that the aim of the entire admonition is to counsel against the too strict observance of the Levitical laws of cleanliness in presence of heathen princes, has too little connection with the context, and is in every respect too artificial.—Stand not in an evil thing, (Ger., "evil word"); i. e., when the king speaks an angry word (דָּבָר רָע) do not excite his anger still more by foolishly standing still, as if thou couldst by obstinately remaining in thy place compel his favor. EWALD and ELSTER correctly give the general sense of the admonition as follows: In presence of a king, it is proper to appear modest and yet firm, to show ourselves neither over timid nor obstinate towards him. The Vulgate, LUTHER, STARKE, etc., are less consistent: "Stand not in an evil thing," i. e., remain not in evil designs against the king, if you have become involved in such;—HENGSTENBERG gives the same. VAIHINGER: "Do not appear in an evil thing." And thus finally HITZIG: "Stand not at an evil command" [i. e., even though the king should command an evil thing, thou must do it, as DOEG, 1 Sam. xxii. 18], a translation which rests on the erroneous supposition that the author presents as speaking, in vers. 2-4, an opponent of his teachings, a defender of a base worldly expediency and a false servility.—For he doeth whatever pleaseth him. This formula serves in other places to show the uncontrolled power of God as ruler of the world (Jon. i. 14; Job xxiii. 13) but must here be necessarily accepted in a relative sense, as an emphatic warning against the fearful wrath of a monarch who is all-powerful, at least in his own realm; comp. Prov. xvi. 14; xix. 12; xx. 2.—Ver. 4 completes the last clause of ver. 3.—Where the word of a king is there is power. שִׁלְטוֹן here, and in ver. 8, need not be considered as an adjective; it can quite as easily express the substantive sense of "ruler, commander," as in Dan. iii. 2, 3 (Chaldaic).—And who may say to him, What doest thou? That is, who can utter an objection to his ordinances and commands? An expression like that at the close of the preceding verse, which is elsewhere only used in glorification of divine power (Job ix. 12; Isa. xlv. 9; Dan. iv. 32; Wisdom xii. 12), but which therefore justifies neither HENGSTENBERG's nor HAHN's reference of the passage to God as the heavenly King, according to HITZIG's assertion: "We have here the servility of an opponent of the king, introduced by the author as speaking in a style which usually indicates the omnipotence of God."

6. Second Strophe. Conclusion. Vers. 5-8. Admonition to submit to the existing arrangements of this life, all of which have God as their final author.—Whoso keepeth the commandment shall feel no evil thing.—מִצְוָה "the commandment," is undoubtedly the same as דְּבַר־מֶלֶךְ, ver. 4, therefore not the Divine law (VAIHINGER, HAHN, HENGSTENBERG, etc.), but the law of earthly authority as the Divine representative. The feeling no evil thing (לא ידע דבר רע) most probably signifies the remaining distant from evil counsels, taking no part in rebellious enterprises (KNOBEL, VAIHINGER, etc.), so that, therefore, דבר רע here expresses a sense different from that in verse 3 above. Yet another explanation of the language, and one consistent with the context, is as follows: "He experiences no misfortune, remains protected from the punishment of transgressing the laws" (ELSTER, HENGSTENBERG). But HEILIGSTEDT, on the contrary, is wrong (comp. EWALD): "he pays no attention to the evil that is done to him, and does not grieve about the injustice that he suffers, but bears it with equanimity;" and also HITZIG: "the keeper of the commandment (the servile slave of tyrants) does not first consider an evil command of his superior, in so far as it is morally evil, but executes it blindly, and thus commits a sin at the bidding of a higher power; the wise man, on the contrary, etc."—a declaration which stands and falls with the previously quoted artificial understanding of ver. 2-4 as antagonistic in speech.—And a wise man's heart discerneth both time and judgment.—That is, the wise man knows that for every evil attempt there comes a time of judgment; see ver. 6. This explanation alone, which is that of the Septuagint [καὶ καιρὸν κρισέως γινώσκει καρδία σοφοῦ] is in accordance with the text; one needs think as little of the judgment which awaits all men, especially wicked princes and tyrants, as of the appointed time of existence of all civil ordinances [ELSTER], or of the proper time and authority to do any thing, or not (HAHN). Ver. 6. For the first clause compare chap. iii. 17.—Therefore the misery of man is great upon him.—That is, on him who unwisely disregards the important truth that there is a time and judgment for every purpose, and therefore takes part in rebellious undertakings against the king; a heavy misfortune visits him as a well-deserved punishment, and he falls a victim of his foolish effort to struggle against the Divinely sanctioned ordinances of this world. Ver. 7. For he knoweth not that which shall be.—He knows not the issue of the undertakings in which he has thoughtlessly allowed himself to be involved; and because the future is veiled to us men, he cannot see what consequences they may have, and how weighty may be the destinies that it entails upon him.—For who can tell him when it shall be?—(Ger., "how it shall be").—Therefore he is not only ignorant of future destinies in themselves, but does not even know their "how," the manner of their entrance. HERZFELD and HITZIG say: "When it shall be," etc. But כַּאֲשֶׁר no where else in this book signifies "when," not even in iv. 17; v. 4, where it is to be taken as conditional; and the idea of time is by no means in harmony with the passage. Ver. 8. There is no man that hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit.—רוּחַ here is different from that in chap. xi. 4 and 5,† where it clearly signifies "wind" (comp. Prov. xxx. 4); it must here be taken in a sense very usual in the O. T., that of "breath of life," "spirit;" comp. iii. 19-21.‡ The meaning of the following clause is most nearly allied to this, and that we find בָּרוּחַ and not בְּרוּחוֹ proves nothing in favor of the contrary acceptation of HITZIG, HAHN, etc.; for the author denies the ability of men to control the breath of life, and purposely in the most general way, in order to show, in the strongest manner, his unconditional dependence on God [just as in the following clause he has the very general בְּיוֹם הַמָּוֶת and not בְּיוֹם מוֹתוֹ].—And there is no discharge in that war.—That is, as little as the law of war, with its inexorable severity, grants a furlough to the soldier before the battle, just so little can a man escape the law of death which weighs on all, and just so unconditionally must he follow when God calls him hence by death.—Neither shall wickedness deliver those that are given to it.—Lit., "its possessors;" comp. vii. 12; and for the sentence, Prov. x. 2; xi. 4, etc. This clause clearly contains the principal thought of the verse, as prepared by the three preceding clauses, and which here makes an impressive conclusion of the whole admonition begun in verse 2 concerning disobedience and disloyalty towards authority.

Ver. 7. Third Strophe. First half. Vers. 9-13. The many iniquities, oppressions and injustices that occur among men, often remain a long time unpunished, but find, at last, their proper reward, as a proof that God rules and judges justly.—All this have I seen.—A transition formula, serving as an introduction to what follows, as in chap. vii. 28. "To see" is here equivalent to observing through experience, and "all this" refers, in the first place, to ver. 5-8, and then to every thing from chap. vii. 28 onward.—And applied my heart unto every work.—For נָתַן אֶת־לֵב comp. i. 13.—The infinitive absolute with copula prefixed indicates an action contemporaneous with the main verb. For what follows comp. i. 14; ii. 17; iv. 3, etc.—There is a time when one man rules over another to his own hurt.—These words clearly form an explanation to what precedes: "every work that is done under the sun;" and they therefore more closely designate the object of the author's observation to be a whole epoch or series of oppressions of men by tyrants.—The words are usually regarded as an independent sentence: "There is a time wherein," etc.; or, "sometimes," or, "at times," "a man rules," etc. (Vulgate, LUTHER, VAIHINGER, HENGSTENBERG, etc.). But the word עֵת alone is not equivalent to "there is a time," or "sometimes;" and to refer the pronoun in לוֹ to the first אָדָם (to his own hurt," i. e., to the hurt of the tyrant) is not in harmony with what follows. Also KNOBEL's explanation: "truly I have also seen tyrants who practiced evil unpunished through whole eras," seems quite unfitting, because it anticipates ver. 10, and introduces into the text the word "truly" that is in no wise indicated.—Ver. 10. And so I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone (to rest).—וּבְכֵן lit.: and under such circumstances,* comp. Esth. iv. 16. The wicked, of whom it is here affirmed that they were buried and went to rest, i. e., they received a distinguished and honorable burial [comp. Isa. xiv. 19; Jer. xxii. 19; and also Ec-

*[We cannot help regarding this as a forcing the text into the support of the extreme monarchical doctrine of passive obedience, notwithstanding the qualification adverted to in the previous note. There is, too, an omission, unusual for ZÖCKLER, of all comment on the first part of ver. 6, which contains not only the connection with what precedes, but furnishes the key to what follows. "The heart of the wise man will acknowledge time and reason" (ver. 5): "for there is time and reason to every thing, although the misery of man (the oppression, the evil rule, under which he suffers) be so great upon him" [עָלָיו implying something laid upon him like a heavy burden). It is all made clear by rendering the second כִּי although, as adversative to the first—a frequent sense of the particle in this book, as is generally shown by the context. It is a strong and passionate assertion: The world is not all confusion; there is time and reason; they will appear at last, though misery so abounds; therefore be patient; watch and wait. Obedience is indeed inculcated to lawful (not merely monarchical) authority, but it is also intimated that it is not to be wholly passive, unreasoning, and blind.—T. L.]

†[There is precisely the same argument for rendering it spirit in chap. xi. 5 (the way of the spirit), as exists for it here. See excursus on that passage, p. 147.—T. L.]

‡[Perhaps there is nothing that shows the unspirituality of some commentators more than their obstinate determination to render רוּחַ wind, and often in utter defiance of the context, as in Gen. i. 2, and in such places as these.—T. L.]

*[וּבְכֵן] is the particle of illustration: "and in such a case," or, taken in the connection: "and so it was." See the Metrical Version—

cles. chap. vi. 3] are the same as those named in ver. 9, who rule over others to their hurt, and are therefore tyrannical oppressors and violent rulers. בָּאוּ lit.: "they entered in," namely, to rest, an abbreviation of the full form which is found in Isa. lvii. 2.—Gone from the place of the holy.—[ZÖCKLER: But went far from the place of the holy.]—The wicked are clearly here no longer the subject, but as in the following clause, "those who did righteously," whose undeservedly sad fate the author well depicts in contrast with that of the former. Therefore the "place of the holy" from which they wandered afar [מִן, as in Isa. xxvi. 14; Zeph. iii. 18; Job xxviii. 4] is the grave, the honorable burial place which these just ones must fail to obtain; to refer this expression to Jerusalem (HITZIG), or to the sacred courts of the leaders of the people (KNOBEL), or to the community of the saints (HENGSTENBERG), is all arbitrary, and opposed to the context. יְהַלֵּכוּ, "they wandered, they went," does not, of course, mean a wandering of the souls of the unburied after death, but simply [in contrast to that word בָּאוּ] the wandering or being carried to another resting place than that holy place," the burial in a grave neither sacred nor honorable. HITZIG'S emendation, יְהַלֵּכוּ, "they pass away," is as unnecessary as the view of EWALD, ELSTER, VAIHINGER, etc., that the Piel הִלֵּךְ is here synonymous with the Hiphil הוֹלִיךְ as though the sense were "I saw them driven away, cast out from the holy place."* —And they were forgotten in the city where they had so done (ZÖCKLER: "who there justly acted).—For עָשָׂה כֵּן "to do right," to act uprightly, comp. 2 Kings vii. 9: for "being forgotten in the city," i. e., in their own place of residence [not in Jerusalem, as HITZIG declares], Comp. vi. 4; Prov. x. 7; Ps. lxxiii. 19, 20. Instead of וְיִשְׁתַּכְּחוּ the Septuagint, Vulgate, and twenty-three manuscripts had וְיִשְׁתַּבְּחוּ "and they were praised;" but this reading appears clearly to be an emendation, and would render necessary this grammatically inadmissible translation: "and they were praised in the city, as if they had acted justly."—This is also vanity.—That is, also this unequal distribution of destiny in human life, is an example of the vanity pervading and controlling all earthly relations; comp. ii. 26; iv. 14, 16; vii. 6, etc.—Ver. 11. Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily.—Because speedy justice is not executed—a very common reason for the increase of crime and wickedness. פִּתְגָם * originally a Persian word [ancient Persian, patigama, modern Per. paigam, Armenian patkam]; lit., "something that has happened or taken place," and, therefore, command, edict, sentence; comp. Esther i. 20. Since in this passage, as in the Chaldaic sections of Ezra and Daniel (e. g., Ez. iv. 17; Dan. iii. 16; iv. 14), the word is always treated as masculine, we should have expected נַעֲשָׂה instead of נַעֲשָׂה. But comp. the examples of the masculine quoted by EWALD, § 74, gr., which, in later authors, are used as feminine.—Therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in him to do evil.—Therefore they venture on evil without any hesitation; comp. ix. 8; Esther vii. 5; Matt. xv. 19.—Vers. 12 and 13. In spite of the universal and ever-increasing prevalence of evil over justice and righteousness, hitherto depicted, the wicked at last find their deserved reward, and oppressed innocence does not perish.—Though a sinner do evil a hundred times.—אֲשֶׁר does not here signify "because" (HITZIG), but "although," "considering that," as כִּי does sometimes (Lat. quod si). *[ZÖCKLER'S version here, which is substantially that of HITZIG, and even of GEIER, seems very forced. How is he to get the sense of "wandering far," or of "being driven away," from יְהַלֵּכוּ? Then, again, the rendering אֲשֶׁר כֵּן עָשׂוּ "they who had done rightly," and making it the subject of יְהַלֵּכוּ, are both unwarranted. STUART well says that the makkeph in כֵּן־עָשׂוּ shows that the Masorites regarded כֵּן as the usual adverb so, and therefore joined it closely to the verb as simply qualifying. The references of ZÖCKLER and HITZIG do not bear them out, and there cannot be found a clear case in the Bible where כֵּן is used absolutely for justice. There are two objections to the finding in this phrase the subject of יְהַלֵּכוּ; one is the separation it makes between it and וּבָאוּ; the second is its coming so late after its verb, making a very unusual Hebrew construction in keeping the sense so long suspended. It seems quite clear that יְהַלֵּכוּ and וּבָאוּ have the same subject—not that a sudden change is unexampled in Hebrew, but because these two verbs so uniformly go together in similar expressions; as in ch. i. 4 דּוֹר הֹלֵךְ, וְדוֹר בָּא "generation goes, and generation comes;" also vi. 4, בַּהֶבֶל בָּא, בַּחֹשֶׁךְ יֵלֵךְ "comes in vanity, goes away in darkness." So here there must be for both the same subject; but is it the wicked, mentioned above, or men generally, not personally or pronominally expressed, because it so readily suggests itself from the mention of burial,—they, the mourners, real or pretended,—they who form the procession (יְהַלֵּכוּ; see remarks on this word in piel, p. 85), who go about the streets, xii. 5, where סָבְבוּ includes both going to and coming from. According to this, there is, indeed, a change of subject from that of the previous clause, but this is far from being unexampled in Hebrew, even without notice; as in Ps. xlix. 19: "For he blesses himself in life, and they will praise [וְיוֹדֻךָ] thee,"—that is, men will praise thee, when thou doest well to thyself. Here, however, the personal subject is so familiar that it is easily understood, and its omission is on that very account all the more impressive: I saw the wicked buried, and from (or to and from) the holy place [the place of burial],—they came and went [men came and went]; then straight were they forgotten, that is, the wicked rulers were forgotten. The coming back to these as the old subject, after the mention of the funeral procession, seems very natural. The crowd disperses, the hired mourners "go about the streets;" it is all over; and soon are they "forgotten in the city where they thus had done,"—where they had ruled to their own dishonor, only to be hated, and at last, after an empty funeral pomp, to be consigned to oblivion. In the description of a scene so well understood, the formal insertion of the logical subject would have made it much less graphic. See Metrical Version.—T. L.]

not to be supplemented by יָמִים, as in the following verse.—Yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God.—כִּי גַם, "yet," makes here a strong contrast. Koheleth represents the idea of just retribution as something certain and lasting, although experience seems so strongly to teach the contrary, and consequently as a conviction that does not rest on empirical observation, but on direct religious faith. "There is not expressed in this verse, as some commentators suppose, the thought of a retribution in after life, but it must be confessed that the standpoint of observation on which Koheleth here places himself could easily lead to this conclusion, although it is not here drawn (ELSTER).—Which fear before him.—Not, "because they fear before him;" אֲשֶׁר is here really a relative pronoun, pointing out the conformity of the conduct of the God-fearing to their designation as such. Comp. 1 Tim. v. 3: χήρας τίμα τὰς ὄντως χήρας.—But it shall not be well with the wicked, neither shall he prolong his days.—This denial of long life to the wicked does not contradict what is said in ver. 12; for there the question was not of long life, but of prolonged sinning.—Which are as a shadow; because he feareth not before God.—[ZÖCKLER: He is as a shadow who feareth not before God.] We have had the same figure in chap. vi. 12. The Vulgate, as well as most modern commentators, are correct in not joining כַּצֵּל, with the Masoretic accentuation, to what precedes [thus also LUTHER, VAIHINGER, HENGSTENBERG; "and as a shadow will not live long"], but to what follows [Vulg. "transeunt"].

8. Third Strophe. Conclusion. Vers. 14 and 15. Since the unequal distribution of human destiny points to the futile character of all earthly occurrences and conditions, we must so much the more enjoy present happiness, and profit by it with a contented mind.—There is a vanity which is done upon the earth.—See ver. 10 and chap. iii. 16. That the lots of the just and the wicked are frequently commingled and interchanged in this world, seems to the Preacher as vanity, i. e., as belonging to the evil consequences of the human fall; but it does not, therefore, make on him an especially "bitter and gloomy" impression, as ELSTER supposes. Comp. HENGSTENBERG: "If there were righteous men such as there should be, wholly righteous, then the experience here given would certainly be in a high degree alarming. But since sin is also indwelling in the just, since they deserve punishment and need watchful care, since they can so easily slide into by-paths and fall into a mercenary worldliness, the shock must disappear for those who really dwell in righteousness. These latter are often severely disturbed by the fact here presented to view, but it is for them only a disturbance. The definitive complaint regarding this comes only from those who without claim or right count themselves among the just. And it is clear that the equality of result for the evil and just is only an external and partial one. To those whom God loves, every thing must be for the best, and the final issue separates the evil from the good."—Ver. 15. Then I commended mirth, *etc.—Comp. the exegetical remarks on ii. 24; iii. 22; v. 19.—For that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life.—Lit., "That clings to him," etc., i. e., that and that only becomes truly his; comp. חוּא חֶלְקוֹ chap. iii. 22; v. 19, which is synonymous in sense. The optative meaning of יִלְוֶנּוּ (HITZIG: "that may cling to him;" HERZFELD: "that may accompany him," etc.), is unnecessary and runs counter to the analogy of those earlier parallels.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

(With Homiletical Hints.)

The warnings against seduction through the snares and amorous arts of women, concerning rebellion against authority, and wicked oppression and violence, are quite dissimilar in their nature, and hang but loosely together. For in the first of these warnings the attention of the author is principally directed to the depraved nature of woman as the originator and principal representative of the ruin of man through sin; in the second, it is less the Divine necessity that is made especially emphatic, than the human utility and profitableness in the obedience to be rendered to kings; and in the third, the principal object of attention is not the wicked conduct of sinners in itself, but the fixed, certain, and just retribution of God for this conduct, together with the useful lesson which the good man is to draw therefrom. The questions concerning the origin, goal, and remedy of human depravity, [the most important problems in anthropology], are in this way touched, but by no means exhaustively treated; and the indicated solutions reveal a certain one-sidedness on account of the brevity of the illustration. It appears, at least, in chap. vii. 28, as if the female sex were thoroughly and without exception evil, and the first woman was represented as the sole originator of the sin of humanity; and just so it seems as if

*["It was then I commended mirth," etc.; that is under such a view of mankind and their destiny. See the text note. The conjunction ו in וְשִׁבַּחְתִּי connects by showing the time and reason. It is very important as showing that the Epicurean aspect Koheleth sometimes exhibits was in connection with, and conditioned upon, such discouraging and gloomy views of human destiny as those just mentioned. And this explains the אֲשֶׁר, in what follows, as the matter or language of the false commendation (quod, ὅτι), "that there was no other good to man,"—or then "I praised mirth," etc. (saying), "that there was no good to man," etc.; and so of what follows: "and that this only remains to him," etc. It is all dependent on שִׁבַּחְתִּי, as the subject matter of the Epicurean commendation. ZÖCKLER omits all remarks on אֲשֶׁר here, and the connection of וְשִׁבַּחְתִּי, although it is so important.

'Twas then that pleasure I extolled:
How that there was no good to man beneath the sun,
Except to eat and drink, and [here] his joy to find,
And this alone attends him in his toil,
During all the days, etc.

Compare the Arabic الْبَقِيَّة res residua, as used in the Koran to denote the portion either of the pious in the life to come, or of the wicked pleasure-seekers in this world.—T. L.]

the remedy against sin and its bad effects were mainly (chap. viii. 2 ff.) unconditional obedience to earthly authority; and then, again, it would appear (chap. viii. 15) that a frivolous and thoughtless joyousness were recommended. But that this is mere appearance, is proved by the connection of each of the respective passages. As in chap. vii. 29, not women alone, but sinning humanity as a whole, are presented as the destroyers of the originally upright, pure, and God-like nature [corresponding to the words of Paul, ἐφ' ᾧ πάντες ἥμαρτον, Rom. v. 12]; not less in chap. viii. 2 ff. is the duty of obedience to authority to be, from the beginning, Divinely influenced, and therefore subordinated to the higher duty of obedience towards God [corresponding with Acts iv. 19]. And finally, the joy recommended in ver. 15 appears clearly as the joy of one fearing God [comp. vers. 12 and 13], and consequently it no more forms an exclusive contrast to the rejoicing with trembling of Ps. ii. 11 than it contradicts the Apostolic admonition: "Rejoice in the Lord always" (Phil. iv. 4). In short, it is every where the conduct of the truly wise man, who, as such, is also the God-fearing man, to which the Preacher directs us, and in which he gets a view of the true ideal in the sphere of ethical anthropology (comp. vii. 23-25; viii. 1, 5).

Thence is drawn for a collective homiletical treatment of this section the following theme: the truly wise man fears God, and guards himself as well against unchastity as against the disloyalty and injustice of this world. Or, the truly wise man in conflict with the enticements of this world, as he meets them first in the cunning of women, secondly, in the desire of rebellion, and thirdly, in the wickedness and arrogant violence of tyrants.

HOMILETICAL HINTS ON SEPARATE PASSAGES.

Chap. vii. 23-25. GEIER:—Our knowledge is fragmentary: the more we learn, the more we perceive how far we are removed from true wisdom, Sirach li. 21 f.; 1 Cor. xiii. 9.—HANSEN:—No one on earth has the ability and skill to acquire a perfect knowledge of the works of God. They remain unfathomably deep and hidden from our eyes.—We must exert all the powers of our soul to discover the difference between wisdom and folly.—STARKE:—Depend not on your own strength in Christianity. You imagine that you make progress, but in reality you retrograde, and lose, in your spiritual arrogance, that which you had already acquired (2 John 8.).—The best teachers are those who teach to others what they themselves have learned by experience.

TÜBINGEN BIBLE:—Man was created in innocence, justice and holiness, and this is the image of God, that he lost after the fall, but after which he should again strive with all earnestness.—HENGSTENBERG:—After the fall, man forgot to remain in a receptive relation, which, in respect to the ἄνωθεν σοφία, is the only proper position; he chases after schemes of his presumptuous thoughts. The only means of becoming free from so dire a disease, and of being delivered from the bonds of his own thoughts and phantoms, is again to return to Divine subjection, and renouncing all his own knowledge, to permit himself to be taught of God.

Chap. viii. 1. ZEYSS:—Impenetrable as is the human heart in itself, it is nevertheless often betrayed by the countenance.—STARKE:—The innocent man looks happy and secure. He who cherishes injustice in the heart looks at no one cheerfully nor rightly.—HENGSTENBERG:—When, by the transforming power of wisdom, the heart of flesh has taken the place of the heart of stone, and inward flexibility and obedience that of terror in presence of God and His commandments, it becomes also evident in the countenance.

Vers. 2, 6. LUTHER:—It is enough for you to do so in the state, that you should obey the king's commands, and listen to him who is ordained of God. Here you see how civil obedience is comprehended in obedience to God. So Paul would have servants obey their masters, not as submitting to men, but as to God.—MELANCHTHON:—Thus is obedience ordained. Obey the Divine voice first; then the king commanding things not repugnant to the Divine law.—This will be in conformity with the rule given Acts iv. 19.—STARKE (ver. 8):—The powerful ones of this world have among men no higher one over them, to whom they must give an account, but in heaven there is One higher than the highest. Wisdom of Solomon vi. 2-4.—(Ver. 5): He who keeps the commandments of God will, for the sake of God and his conscience, also obey the salutary commands of authority, Col. iii. 23.—HENGSTENBERG (Ver. 5):—The wise heart knows well that as certainly as God will judge justly in His own time, so certainly also can he not be really and lastingly unhappy who keeps the commandments, and therefore has God on his side.—(Ver. 6): With all his power, man is nevertheless not independent, but is subjected to the heavy blows of human destiny. Thus all men will be unable to place any impediment to the execution of the justice of God for the good of His children.

Ver. 7, 8. HIERONYMUS (Ver. 8): We are not to mourn, though often oppressed by the unjust and powerful; since all these things come to an end in death, and the proud potentate himself, after all his tyrannical cruelties, cannot retain the soul when taken away by death.—CRAMER (Ver. 7):—It is vain that we anxiously trouble ourselves about the progress and issue of things to come; therefore we should abandon our prying desire. Ps. xxxvii. 5.—GEIER:—The last conflict and struggle is the hardest and most dangerous; but a pious Christian should not be terrified at it; for the conquest of Jesus over death will become his own through faith; temporal death is for him only a dissolution, a passing away in peace.

MELANCHTHON:—This question tortures all minds; so that many who see the prosperity of the wicked, and the misfortunes of the just, begin to think there is no Providence. It is the excelling strength of faith, that it is not broken by such spectacles, but retains the true cognition of God, and waits patiently for the judgment.—OSIANDER:—It does not become us to dictate to God how He shall rule the world. Let it satisfy us that God rules, and will finally bring to light the justice of His judgment.—Because God delays a while in the punishment of sin, men falsely convince themselves that their wickedness will go wholly unpunished, Sirach v. 4, 5.—J. LANGE:—The children of God consider the patience of the Lord their salvation [2 Pet. iii. 15]; whilst the wicked consider this patience as a privilege to sin the more boldly (Rom. vi. 1). But however happy they may esteem themselves, they nevertheless die unblessed, and their happiness is changed into eternal shame.

Vers. 14 and 15. BERLEB. BIBLE:—Joy is a godly cheerfulness and serenity of soul; since the just man, though he may suffer from the vanities of this world, which are common to all, keeps his soul free from vain cares, calm through faith in God, and hence cheerful and ready in the performance of its duties; so that he eats, drinks and rejoices, i. e., enjoys what God gives him, in a calm, cheerful, and fitting manner.—HENGSTENBERG:—[See previous exegetical illustrations to ver. 14].

FOURTH DISCOURSE.

Of the relation of true wisdom in the internal and external life of man.

(CHAP. VIII. 16—XII. 7.)

A. The unfathomable character of the universal rule of God should not frighten the wise man from an active part in life, but should cheer and encourage him thereto.

(CHAPTER VIII. 16—IX. 16.)

1. It cannot be denied that the providence of God in the distribution of human destiny is unfathomable and incomprehensible.

(CHAP. VIII. 16—IX. 6.)

16 When I applied mine heart to know wisdom, and to see the business that is done upon the earth: (for also there is that neither day nor night seeth sleep with his 17 eyes:) Then I beheld all the work of God, that a man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun: because though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it; yea, further; though a wise man think to know it, yet shall he not be able to find it.

IX. 1 For all this I considered in my heart even to declare all this, that the righteous and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of God: no man knoweth either love
2 or hatred by all that is before them. All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked; to the good, and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not; as is the good, so
3 is the sinner; and he that sweareth, as he that feareth an oath. This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun, that there is one event unto all: yea, also the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while
4 they live, and after that they go to the dead. For to him that is joined to all the 5 living there is hope: for a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the living know that they shall die: but the dead know not any thing, neither have they any 6 more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the sun.

2. Therefore it behooves us to enjoy this life cheerfully, and to use it in profitable avocations.

(VERS. 7–10).

7 Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for 8 God now accepteth thy works. Let thy garments be always white; and let thy 9 head lack no ointment. Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity, which he hath given thee under the sun, all the days of thy vanity: for that is thy portion in this life, and in thy labour which thou takest 10 under the sun. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might, for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest.

3. The uncertain result of human effort in this world should not deter us from zealously striving after wisdom.

VERS. 11-16.

11 I returned, and saw under the sun, that the race is not to the swift nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding,
12 nor yet favour to men of skill; but time and chance happeneth to them all. For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare; so are the sons of men snared in an evil
13 time, when it falleth suddenly upon them. This wisdom have I seen also under the 14 sun, and it seemed great unto me: There was a little city, and few men within it; and there came a great king against it, and besieged it, and built great bulwarks
15 against it: Now there was found in it a poor wise man, and he by his wisdom de-16 livered the city; yet no man remembered that same poor man; Then said I, Wisdom is better than strength: nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard.

[Ch. viii. 17.—בְּשֶׁל equivalent to באשר ל, "in that which to"—"in proportion to;" Vulgate well renders it quanto plus. LXX. ὅσα ἐὰν; "in proportion to that which one shall labor"—or "the more he labors." It is found elsewhere only in Jonah i. 7, or, in composition, בְּשֶׁלְּמִי and בְּשֶׁלִּי. It is certainly not a Chaldaism, but it is said "to belong to the later Hebrew," and the argument runs in this way: Koheleth must belong to the later Hebrew, because this word is elsewhere found only in Jonah; and Jonah must belong to the later Hebrew, because this word is elsewhere found only in Koheleth. It is also called a Rabbinism in Koheleth; but it is rather a Kohelethism much employed, with other Kohelethisms, by the earliest Rabbins, because that book was a great favorite with them, and regarded by them as a specimen of the more elegant and courtly, as well as the more philosophical Hebrew.—Ch. ix. 1, וְלָבוּר; it has the same meaning here with ברר, Ecclesiastes iii. 18, to explore—prove by exploring—primary sense, separate, purify. It is an example of the affinity, or of the interchange of meanings, in verbs ain wau and double ain.—T. L.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. VAIHINGER deviates from the above analysis of this section into three divisions, but only so far as to extend the first division simply to chap. ix. 3, which does not well coincide with the contents of ver. 4-6, that clearly refer to what immediately precedes. Several commentators begin a new section with chap. ix. 11 [HAHN, indeed a new discourse], and deny in this way that the principal theme of the whole piece—the contrast between the inscrutability of human destinies, and the wisdom which still retains its worth, and is to be sought after as the highest good—is also treated in this last division, and that it is more closely allied with the foregoing than with that which follows ver. 17.—HENGSTENBERG also very improperly separates vers. 11, 12 from the four subsequent ones, with which they are most closely connected; see below at ver. 13.

First Strophe, first division. Chap. viii. 16, 17. The universal rule of God is unfathomable.—When I applied mine heart.—Lit., "gave;" comp. chap. viii. 9, כַּאֲשֶׁר introduces the longer primary clause, to which then, in ver. 17, a still longer secondary clause corresponds, introduced by וְ or וְרָאִיתִי. There is no closer connection with the preceding, such as is affirmed by ROSENMUELLER, HITZIG, HENGSTENBERG and HAHN, according to the example of most old authors. The commendation of pleasure in ver. 15, like the earlier praise of cheerfulness [chap. ii. 24; iii. 22; v. 18, 20], fittingly closes the preceding, whilst this clause, as is shown by כִּי chap. ix. 1, serves as a basis and preparation for the subsequent reflections.—To know wisdom, and see the business.—Comp. i. 13, 17. The word עִנְיָן is here as there the travail caused by a zealous searching after the grounds and aims of human action, fate, and life.—For also there is that neither day nor night. כִּי here gives the nature and operation of the travail; or is inferential, "so that," as Gen. xl. 15; Ex. iii. 11, etc. [comp. VAIHINGER]. The parenthetical interpretation of this third clause [EWALD, ELSTER, HAHN, etc.] is also unnecessary.—"To see sleep" is equivalent to enjoying sleep; comp. Gen. xxxi. 40; Prov. vi. 4; Ps. cxxxii. 4 (Lat. somnum videre).—Ver. 17. Then I beheld all the work of God. אֶת־כָּל־מַעֲשֵׂה הָאֱלֹהִים is the accusative of relation: "I saw in relation to all the work of God." The work that is done under the sun, that we find in the subsequent clause, is the same as the "work of God," the universal rule of the Most High; and the inability to find this work, its incomprehensibility and inscrutability [comp. Ps. cxlvii. 5; Rom. xi.

88] form from the beginning the principal theme of the assertion. To "find" is used in the sense of "to comprehend, to fathom;" comp. iii. 11; vii. 24.—Because though a man labour to seek it out.—That is, however much he may try, in spite of all his toil, etc. בְּשֶׁל אֲשֶׁר* is equivalent to בַּאֲשֶׁר-לַאֲשֶׁר [comp. the similar crowding of relations in Jonah i. 7, 8, 12, and also the Aramaic בְּדִיל דְּ], and signifies, when taken together with the following verb יַעֲמֹל, "with that which is in it," etc.; that is, "with that which there is in his labor," or "with that zeal and talent perceptible in it." Compare HITZIG on this passage, who correctly rejects as unnecessary EWALD's emendation בְּכָל אֲשֶׁר in place of בְּשֶׁל אֲשֶׁר, although the LXX., Vulgate, and Syriac seem to have so read it.—Yea further, though a wise man think to know it.—אִם יֹאמַר "should he presume," "should he attempt;" comp. Exod. ii. 14; 2 Sam. xxi. 16.

8. First strophe, second division. Chap. ix. 1-8. All men, the just, as well as the unjust, are subject to the same fate, especially to the law of mortality.—For all this I considered in my heart. Namely, when I applied my heart to know wisdom, chap. viii. 16. "All this" refers to what immediately follows.—Even to declare all this. The infinitive construct with לְ: לָבוּר continues the finite verb, as elsewhere the infinitive absolute; comp. Isa. xxxviii. 20; x. 32, בּוּר equivalent to בָּרַר (chap. iii. 18) is found only in this passage in the O. T.—That the righteous and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of God. That is, wholly dependent on Him, not capable, in any manner, independently to shape their life; so that their best actions may be followed by the saddest fate. Comp. HENGSTENBERG on this passage, who correctly shows that there is affirmed an unconditional dependence, not of human action in itself, but of its results on God.—No man knoweth either love or hatred. That is, no man knoweth in advance whether God will grant him love or hatred (i. e., happiness or unhappiness); (MICHAELIS, KNOBEL, VAIHINGER, and HENGSTENBERG are correct). Others read: "No man knoweth whether he will love or hate;" [HITZIG, ELSTER]. But this interpretation is not in harmony with the text, and would give a sense which is foreign alike to the passage and the book, and for which chap. ii. 5 cannot be quoted as proof, as is done by HITZIG.—By all that is before them. That is, not as affirmed by HIERONYMUS, GEIER, and ROSENMUELLER,—all their destinies are clear, and as it were visible before their eyes, but the reverse: all their destinies lie in the dark uncertain future before them; they have yet everything to experience, happiness as well as unhappiness, good as well as evil. Comp. vii. 14, where אַחֲרָיו "behind him" signifies just the same as here לִפְנֵיהֶם "before them." Knobel unnecessarily insists that כֹּל here means: Everything is before them, everything can occur to them—even great misfortune—a sense that would need to be more clearly indicated by the context than is here the case.—Ver. 2.—All things come alike to all. That is, every thing happens to the wise and just as to all others; the just have no special fortune, they share the common fate of all (in this world of course). KNOBEL, EWALD, HEILIGSTEDT, UMBREIT, and HENGSTENBERG correctly take this position, whilst HITZIG and ELSTER include the following words מִקְרֶה אֶחָד, and so bring out this somewhat obscure and distorted thought: "All are as all, they meet one fate;" but VAIHINGER takes הַכֹּל at the beginning of the verse as an elliptical repetition from ver. 1: "Yes all! Just as all have the same destiny," etc.—There is one event to the righteous and to the wicked. Not that they are the offspring and the victims of one and the same blind power of chance [HITZIG], but they are subjected to one and the same divine providence as regards the issue of their life. HENGSTENBERG justly says: "Chance (מִקְרֶה) just as in iii. 19 (comp. ii. 14, 15), does not form the counterpart to divine providence, but to the spontaneous activity on the part of the just."—To the good and to the clean and to the unclean. In order that one may not take clean and unclean in the levitical or externally legal sense, but in the moral sense, the kindred thought of טוֹב (good) precedes that of טָהוֹר (pure) as explanatory.—He that sweareth as he that feareth an oath. That is, the frivolous swearer, and he that considers an oath sacred. That this is the sense is plainly seen in chap. viii. 2, from which passage it appears that it does not enter the author's mind to condemn the oath in general as something immoral. VAIHINGER is of opinion that by him that feareth an oath, as by him that does not sacrifice, is meant an Essene, or at least a representative of growing Essenianism. But the designation is by no means clear enough for this; and the one not sacrificing seems clearly to be a wicked contemner of the levitical laws concerning the temple and sacrifices, and not an unreasonably conscientious ascetic in the sense of Essenianism.—Ver. 3.—This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun. רָע בְּכֹל וגו cannot mean the worst of all, etc. (ROSENMUELLER, VAIHINGER) but in the absence of the article before רָע (comp. the Song of Solomon i. 8; Jos. xiv. 15, etc.), simply bad, evil among all things, or in all things; therefore an evil accompanying and dwelling in every earthly occurrence.—That there is one event unto all. Namely, that befalls all. מִקְרֶה must be taken as in verse 2, and points out, therefore, not what one meets with in life, but its issue, its end. The equal liability of all to death, even the good and the just, is designated by Koheleth as that evil, that evil thing that is mixed with every earthly occurrence; (comp. Rom. v. 14, 21; 1 Cor. xv. 55 f.; Heb. ii. 15). Yea, also the heart of the sons of men is full of evil; namely, in consequence of this their liability to the power of death, which, therefore, also in addition exerts a demoralizing effect on them; comp. chap. viii. 11.—And after that they go to the dead. The suffix to אַחֲרָיו is to be considered as neuter, ("and after this condition," comp. Jer. li. 46), not masculine as if the sense were "and after it" (i. e., after this life) as in vi. 12; x. 14. The preposition of motion (אֶל in אֶל הַמֵּתִים) "indicates that the sense of 'it goes,' is to complete the sentence," HITZIG.

4. First strophe, conclusion. Vers. 4-6. In spite of the presentation just given, the condition of the living is ever to be preferred to that of the dead.—For to him that is joined (ZÖCKLER, taking the reading יְבֻחַר translates it, "who is it that is preferred?"—T. L.). Thus according to the k'tib יְבֻחַר, pual of בחר "to choose, prefer," does VAIHINGER more correctly give the sense: "There is no one who would be here preferred and accepted, or who would have a choice, who would be exempted from death; since dying is a common fate; each one must go to the dead; but in death there is nothing more to hope." In the same way, substantially, does ELSTER translate, except that he punctuates יִבְחַר, and therefore gives it actively; "For who has any choice?" Many later commentators adhere to the k'ri יְחֻבַּר, which the LXX. read (τίς ὃς κοινωνεῖ πρὸς πάντας τοὺς ζῶντας) together with Symmachus and the Targum. They translate, therefore, with EWALD, "who is joined to the living has hope," or, with HITZIG, interrogatively, "who is it who would be joined to all the living?" But the sense thus arising makes a very forced* connection; and the translation of HAHN, who takes the word חבר in the sense of "charming," is open to very weighty linguistic objections.—To all the living there is hope. Literally, "for all living," for all as long as they live. The grammatical expression does not accord with HENGSTENBERG's interpretation: "One may trust to all living;" for אֶל is used with the verb בטח (Ps. iv. 6; xxxi. 7), but not with the substantive בִּטָּחוֹן for the introduction of the one in whom the confidence is placed. Comp. Job xi. 18.—For a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the most contemptible and hateful thing that lives (comp. for the proverbial use of the dog in this relation, 1 Sam. xvii. 43; 2 Sam. ix. 8; Isa. lxvi. 8; Matt. xv. 26; Rev. xxii. 15, etc.) is more valuable than the most majestic of all beasts if it is dead; (for the majesty and glory of the lion as the king of beasts, consult Isa. xxxviii. 13; Hosea xiii. 7; Lamentations iii. 10; Job x. 16). This proverb is also known to the Arabs. See GOLIUS, Adag. Cent. 2, n. 8.

Ver. 5.—For the living know that they shall die. The consciousness of the necessity of death, is here presented not as the only, but yet as the characteristic superiority of the living over the dead, just as if only the necessity of death were the object of human knowledge—an individualizing statement of an ironical and yet most serious nature.—Neither have they any more reward. Not that they have had their share (HITZIG) but that God no longer exercises retributive justice towards them, because they are wanting in conscious, personal life. The fact of a retribution in a world beyond, is only apparently denied here, for the author now sees only the conditions of this world: on the subsequent fate of a spirit returned to God he is for the present entirely silent (chap. xii. 7; comp. xi. 9)—For the memory of them is forgotten. So entirely do the dead remain without reward; not even the smallest thing that could profit them here below, not even the preservation of their memory with their posterity, is granted to them. Comp. Ps. xxxi. 12; Job xiv. 21. It is doubtful whether זֵכֶר "memory" is intended to rhyme with the preceding שָׂכָר "reward" (as HITZIG supposes). It is more probable that such a rhyming is made in the following verse between שִׂנְאָתָם and קִנְאָתָם.—Ver. 6. A continued description of the sad fate of the dead; "from the very beginning with touching depth of tone, a strain of lamentation overpowering the author" (HITZIG). Also their love and their hatred and their envy is now perished. That is, not that they are deprived of the objects of their love, hatred, or envy (KNOBEL), but these sentiments and activities themselves have ceased for them; as רפאים they are destitute of all affections, interests, and exertions, and lead rather a merely seeming life. (ROSENMUELLER, HITZIG). The sad existence of departed souls in Scheol, as described in Job xiv. 11 ff., seems here to hover before the author, just as in ver. 10 below, he expressly speaks of it. It is significant that he denies them love as well as hatred, and would seem thereby to mark their condition as one extremely low.

5. Second strophe, vers. 7-10. On account of this superiority of life, compared with the condition of the dead, and the uncertainty of human fate in general, it behooves us to enjoy life cheerfully (vers. 7-9), and to use it zealously in the activity of our vocations (ver. 10).—Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart. (Comp. ii. 24; v. 19). This collective triad, "eat, drink, and be merry," is here, as it were, increased to a quartette; joy being doubly designated, first as it finds its expression in cheerful adornments of the body and appropriate ornament, and then in loving unison with a wife.—Wine* is used as a symbol and producer of joy, and also in chap. x. 19; Gen. xxvii. 25; Ps. civ. 15, etc. For בְּלֶב־טוֹב, "of joyful heart, gay," comp. 1 Sam. xxv. 36; also chap. vii. 3 of the foregoing.—For God now accepteth thy works. That is, not that God finds pleasure in just this eating, drinking, etc. (HITZIG),

*[It may well be said, on the other hand, that the exceedingly forced rendering of ZÖCKLER and VAIHINGER show that the common translation "joined, associated," and the reading יְחֻבַּר on which it is grounded, are correct—T. L.]

but, thy moral conduct and efforts have long pleased Him,* wherefore thou mayst hope in the future surely to receive thy reward from Him. (HENGSTENBERG correctly takes this position).—Ver. 8. Let thy garments be always white. White garments are the expression of festive joy and pure, calm feelings in the soul, comp. Rev. iii. 4 f.; vii. 9 ff. Koheleth could hardly have meant a literal observance of this precept, so that the conduct of Sisinnius, Novatian bishop of Constantinople, who, with reference to this passage, always went in white garments, was very properly censured by Chrysostom as Pharisaical and proud. HENGSTENBERG'S view is arbitrary, and in other respects scarcely corresponds to the sense of the author: "White garments are here to be put on as an expression of the confident hope of the future glory of the people of God, as SPENER had himself buried in a white coffin as a sign of his hope in a better future of the Church."—And let thy head lack no ointment. As in 2 Sam. xii. 20; xiv. 2; Isa. lxi. 3; Amos vi. 6; Prov. xxvii. 9; Ps. xlv. 8, so here appears the anointing oil, which keeps the hair smooth and makes the face to shine, as a symbol of festive joy, and a contrast to a sorrowing disposition. There is no reason here for supposing fragrant spikenard (Mark xiv. 2), because the question is mainly about producing a good appearance by means of the ointment, comp. Ps. cxxxiii. 2.—Ver. 9.—Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest. That is, enjoy life with her, comp. iii. 1; Ps. xxxiv. 12; and also chap. vii. 28, above, to which expression, apparently directed against all intercourse with women, the present one serves as a corrective.—All the days of the life of thy vanity. This short repetition of the preceding ("all the days of thy vain life, which he has given thee under the sun") is left out of the Septuagint and Chaldaic, but is produced in the Vulgate, and should be by no means wanting, because it points with emphasis† to the vanity of life as a principal motive to joy.—For that is thy portion in this life and in thy labor, etc. That is, for this cheerful and moderate enjoyment of life shall, according to the will of God, compensate thee for the toil and labor which this life brings with it; comp. ii. 10; iii 22; v. 18.—Ver. 10.—Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might, The word בְּכֹחֲךָ is by the Vulgate and most modern authors joined to עֲשֵׂה, whilst according to the accents and the collocation, it belongs to what precedes. But it is a vigorous doing, nevertheless, that is here recommended; for the sense is clear: whatsoever presents itself, is to be performed with thy strength, whatsoever offers itself to thee as an object for thy exertion, that do! For the expression, "whatsoever thy hand findeth to do," comp. 1 Sam. x. 7; xxiii. 8; Judges ix. 33; also Isa. x. 13, 14.—For there is no work nor device, etc., in the grave whither thou goest. comp. ver. 6. As Koheleth gives a motive here in his admonition to an active life, by pointing to the lifeless and inactive condition of departed souls in the realm of death, so speaks Christ in John ix. 4: ἐμὲ δεῖ ἐργάζεσθαι ἕως ἡμέρα ἐστίν· ἔρχεται νὺξ ὅτε οὐδεὶς δύναται ἐργάζεσθαι. Since the νὺξ (night) mentioned in John ix. 4 and elsewhere, is clearly something else than the שְׁאוֹל of this passage, there is no definite reference to the latter, as HENGSTENBERG affirms, but between the two assertions there is a certain analogy.

*[As there is nothing said about moral conduct in the text, or any other conduct except unrestrained eating and drinking, this remark of ZÖCKLER's is perfectly gratuitous. If it is to be taken as serious advice of Koheleth, then HITZIG's view is far more logical: "It is just this eating, drinking, etc., that God approves beforehand, so that you can indulge, without any scruple to disturb your sensual joy." How contrary this is to other declarations of Koheleth we have elsewhere shown. How utterly opposed it is to other numerous passages of Scripture need not be pointed out. It is equivalent to saying God will never "bring thee into judgment" for it, or that He is utterly indifferent. See the Appendix to this Division, p. 134.—T. L.]

†[Ver. 9. "The days of thy vain life," or, more literally, "all the days of the life of thy vanity." The lxx. left out this second mention because they regarded it as a mere repetition. MARTIN GEIER would connect it, not with the former, which he says would be odiosa repetitio, but specially with what is said about the wife, as indicating that the conjugal relation continues through life, as also the idea, Luke xxvi. 36, that there is no marriage in the other world. Other commentators have, in like manner, been disturbed by it, but it only shows that no amount of piety, or of learning, will fit a man to be a true interpreter of this book without something of the poetic spirit by which it is pervaded. It is not emphasis merely, much less an enforced motive to joy, that this repetition gives us, as HITZIG and ZÖCKLER maintain, but a most exquisite pathos in view of the transitoriness and poverty of life. The style of diction reveals the style of thought, showing how far it is from the Epicurean sentiment of any kind, whether gross or moderate. It is the language of one musing, soliloquizing, full of some touching thought that causes him to linger over his words, and keep their sad music in his ear. There are examples of it in the Greek poets, especially in HOMER, which have led the ancient writers on rhetoric to give it a technical name. Thus PLUTARCH calls it ἐπαναφορά, and so also the later writer MACROBIUS, Saturnal. Lib. iv. 6, more particularly describes it: Nascitur pathos et de repetitione quam Græci ἐπαναφορὰν vocant, cum sententiæ ab iisdem nominibus incipiunt: "Pathos also comes from repetition, which the Greeks call epanaphora, when sentences begin from the same words." It receives some of its best illustrations from passages in the Iliad, such as xx. 371, xxiii. 641, and especially xxii. 126, which, though very different from this, in other respects, has this same kind of pathetic repetition. It is Hector soliloquizing in the time of his awful danger from the near approach of Achilles—> οὐ μέν πως νῦν ἐστιν ἀπὸ δρυὸς οὐδ' ἀπὸ πέτρης, > τῷ ὀαριζέμεναι, ἅτε παρθένος ἠΐθεός τε, > παρθένος—ἠΐθεός τ' ὀαρίζετον ἀλλήλοιιν.

> No time for such a friendly parley now,
> As when from oak and rock, the youth and maid,
> The youth and maid, hold parlance sweet together.

Very different is the sentence of Solomon in its subject matter, but like it in pathos, in the peculiar repetitive diction to which it gives rise, and the musing state of soul from which it flows:

> Go then, with gladness eat thy bread, and merrily drink thy wine,
> Thy garments ever white, thy head with fragrant oil adorned;
> Enjoy with her whom thou dost love, the days of thy vain life,—
> The days of thy vain life, the all, that God has given to thee Beneath the sun.

It is indeed irony, but not that of scorning sarcasm, nor of heartless satire. It is the irony of Scripture, full of a mournful tenderness, taking this as its most impressive form of serious admonition. Interpreted in its spirit, and even by what is rhetorically revealed upon its face, there is no contradiction between it and vii. 2, 3; ii. 2; and other passages in this book that represent sobriety, and even sadness, as morally and spiritually better for man than mirth. We have dwelt more fully on these topics, and at the hazard of some repetition, in the extended excursus on the alleged Epicureanism of Koheleth, p. 131. It has been done, because no ideas suggested by the book seemed more important in their bearing upon its thorough interpretation.—T. L.]

6. Third strophe, Introduction. Vers 11 and 12. Human actions in this world depend entirely on divine fate, and their success, therefore, is too often in no comparison with the real ability and strength of the actor.—I returned.—Comp. chap. iv. 1. For the infinitive absolute וְרָאֹה comp. chap. viii. 9.—That the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. These remarks serve only to illustrate what follows: "Neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favor to men of skill." חֵן favor, as in Ex. iii. 22; xi. 3; xii. 36, etc. —But time and chance happeneth to them all.—That is, the success of human actions depends wholly on that higher power which controls the change of seasons, and permits men to be met sometimes by this, sometimes by that (פֶּגַע) which "happens, meets;" (comp. 1 Kings v. 18). A New Testament parallel is found in Rom. ix. 16, where, instead of time and chance, divine mercy is called the highest power in all human affairs.—Ver. 12. For man also knoweth not his time. A conclusion, a majori ad minus. "Even over his time itself, over his person and his life, to say nothing of his actions (ver. 11), there is a controlling power outside of him" (Hitzig). The "time" of a man is here clearly equivalent to the time of his destruction; as elsewhere the "day," of Job xviii. 20; or the "hour," Job xii. 27; Mark xiv. 41. Comp. also chap. vii. 17 preceding.—As the fishes that are taken. For net, and noose, and trap, as symbols of the judgments overtaking men, comp. Hosea vii. 12; Ezek. xii. 13; xxxii. 3; Prov. vii. 23; Luke xxi. 35.—So are the sons of men snared. יוּקָשִׁים Part. Pual see Ew. § 169. d. The word strikingly represents the helpless condition of men in the presence of divine destiny, that can put an end to their life at any moment, as the fowler who suddenly robs of its life the bird caught in the snare. An allusion to the catastrophe threatened to the Persian kingdom by a new universal monarchy, the Macedonian, is not found in the passage, as Hengstenberg supposes.

7. Third strophe. Conclusion. Vers. 13-16. In spite of that dependence of human destiny and success on a higher power, which often violently interferes with them, wisdom remains, nevertheless, a valuable possession, still able to effect great results with inconsiderable means of an external character, as is seen in the example of a poor and despised man, who, by his wisdom, became the deliverer of his native city from threatening danger of destruction. Whether this example is a purely feigned didactic story (thus think Hengstenberg, Luther, Mercerus, Starke, et al.), or whether it refers to an historical fact within the experience of the author, must remain uncertain, on account of the general character of the description; and this so much the more so, because the only passage that could seem to refer to a definite fact from Persian history (ver. 15) is of doubtful exposition.—This wisdom have I seen also under the sun. (Zöckler, this have I seen as wisdom). The words גַּם זֹה רָאִיתִי חָכְמָה must clearly be thus translated (comp. the similar construction in chap. vii. 25), not, "thus also saw I wisdom," etc. (thus usually), or, "this also have I seen: wisdom,"* etc. (as Hitzig renders it,) changing זֹה into זֶה.—And it seemed great unto me, i. e., it appeared large, comp. Jonah iii. 3.—Ver. 14.—There was a little city, and few men within it. That is, not few inhabitants in general, but few fighting men available for defence—a circumstance which shows the danger of the city to be so much greater, and the merits of its deliverer to be so much more brilliant.—And there came a great king against it. We cannot deduce from the expression that the great king was the Persian; because the predicate גָּדוֹל attributed to the hostile king serves mainly to show the contrast to the smallness of the city, and the great size of the army led against it.—And built great bulwarks against it. מְצוֹדִים (from מָצוֹד "an instrument for seizure," hence sometimes a "net;" e. g. vii. 26) is here used only in the signification of bulwarks, and must therefore not here be confounded with the more customary מְצוּרִים (Deut. xx. 20; Micah iv. 14), as two manuscripts here read.—Ver. 15. Now there was found in it a poor wise man. Literal, "one found in it," impersonal—not, "he, the king found." —Yet no man remembered that same poor man. [Zöckler renders in the pluperfect "had remembered," etc., and then makes it the ground of the remarks that follow. —T. L.] We can neither urge against this pluperfect rendering of וְאָדָם לֹא זָכַר the circumstance that the one in question is here designated as אִישׁ מִסְכֵּן and not as חָכָם (for the predicate poor is clearly to point out why they did not remember him—), nor also the contents of the following verse. For in it the emphasis lies upon the commendation of wisdom contained in the first clause, not on the subsequent restrictive remark concerning the contempt and disregard that it often meets with. Vaihinger is correct in his deviation from Hitzig, Ewald, Elster, and most modern authors, who, like the Vulgate and Luther, translate: "no man remembered." As certain as this sense, according to which the discussion would be concerning a deliverer of his country, rewarded with the ingratitude of his fellow-citizens, is approached neither through language nor connection, just so certainly may we not (with Ewald and some ancient authors) here find an allusion to Themistocles as deliverer of Athens from the hand of Xerxes: and this latter so much the less because Athens could scarcely have been designated by the author as עִיר קְטַנָּה. Hitzig is of opinion that the besieged city is the little sea port Dora, vainly besieged by Antiochus the Great in the year 218 (Polyb. v. 66); but nothing is known of the deliverance of this city by a "poor wise man," and for many reasons the epoch of this book cannot be brought down to so late an era as that of Antiochus Magnus. Comp. the Introduction, § 4, Obs. 3.—Ver. 16. The moral of the story, is given in the words of Koheleth uttered immediately after he had heard it.—Then said I, wisdom is better than strength. Comp. similar sentences in chap. vii. 19; Prov. xiv. 29; xvi. 32; xxi. 22; xxiv. 5.—Nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised. These words, which again limit the praise of wisdom expressed above, depend also on the expression, "Then said I." They refer, according to ver. 15, to the fact that in the beginning no one had thought of the wisdom of that deliverer of the city—and not even of the ingratitude afterwards shown to him, or of not having followed his wise counsels (which latter view however would be in antagonism with ver. 15, according to which the sorely pressed city was really delivered).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

(With Homiletical Hints.)

As the previous section contained a series of ethical precepts with an anthropological foundation (similar to the one preceding it) so is this one a combination of theological and ethical truths, which the author lays to the heart of his readers. And it is especially the doctrine of the incomprehensibility of the decrees and judgments of God, and of the hidden character of His universal rule that the author treats, and from which he derives the duties of a cheerful enjoyment and use of the blessings of life (ix. 7-9) of an untiring activity (ix. 10) and of continued striving after practical wisdom as a possession that is valuable under all circumstances. The contents are therefore similar to those of chap. iii., only that there the principal thought is of the conditioning and restrictive character of the divine counsels and acts of universal rule; here, on the contrary, the prominent idea is their hidden and unsearchable nature (Rom. ix. 33; 1 Cor. xiii. 12). This section is also in close relation with chap. vi., especially in regard to its ethical and practical precepts (comp. ix. 9, with vi. 12; ix. 14, with vi. 8; ix. 1-6, with vi. 2-6, etc.), only that from the former, the conclusions drawn are mainly serious and gloomy, while from the latter they are predominantly cheerful.

Homily on the whole section. The thought of the brevity of human life, and the obscurity of that which awaits us in it, should not discourage but impel us to a ready and cheerful use of the blessings granted us here below, as well as of the powers for a truly wise exertion; or more briefly: Of the blessing and value of reflections concerning death, as an impulse to the zealous fulfilment of the avocations of life.

HOMILETICAL HINTS TO SEPARATE PASSAGES.

Chap. viii. 16, 17. Hieronymus:—He shows that there are causes for all things, why each thing should thus be, and that there is righteousness in all, though they may be latent and beyond the comprehension.—Zeyss: a Christian should neither show himself negligent in investigating the works of God, nor too curious.—Hansen: God's works that He performs among the children of men have eternity in view, and nothing short of eternity will open up to us their inner perfection, Rev. xv. 3.—Berlenb. Bible: —O ye poor blind men, who think to fathom by your wisdom the cause of divine providences; ye are indeed greatly deceived! You condemn everything that surpasses our understanding, when you should rather confess that these things are so much the more divine, the more they surpass your comprehension. The more trouble you take to fathom the secrets of wisdom by your own study, so much the less do you attain your goal. The true test that a man possesses genuine wisdom, is when he is assured that he cannot comprehend the mysteries of God as He deals with souls.—Hengstenberg:—Blessed is the man who accepts without examination all that God sends him, in the firm trust that it is right, however wrong it may appear, and that to those who love God all things must be for the best.

Chap. ix. 1-3. Brenz (ver. 1):—There are those whom God loves and whom He hates. For He does not cast off the whole human race, though He might justly do so; neither does He embrace all men in His favor; but to some He deigns to grant His mercy, whilst others He leaves to their own destruction. There is, however, no one who can know by any external sign, whom God receives or rejects.—(Ver. 2, 3). Whoever in faith looks into the word of God may easily know that, though the wicked may now seem to have the same fortune with the pious, there shall come, at last, a clear discrimination between the good and the bad, adjudging the one class to eternal punishment, the others to the happiness of everlasting life.—Geier (ver. 2, 3). We cannot judge of the condition of the dead after this life, by our reason, but only by its accordance with the revealed word of God.—Hansen:—We are to ascribe it to the peculiarities of this present life, if the just suffer with the wicked; Sirach xl. 1 ff.

Zeyss:—A child of God should love this life not on account of temporal prosperity, but for the honor of God, and the welfare of his neighbor. Cramer:—So long as the wicked lives, it is better for him than if he is dead, since he has yet time to repent. But when he is dead then all hope for him is lost. Starke:—Atheists live in the foolish delusion that after death all is over and that the soul ceases with the death of the body; but they will receive the most emphatic contradiction on the great day of judgment.

Vers. 7-10. Luther (ver. 7):—You live in a world where there is nothing but sorrow, misery, grief, and death, with much vanity: therefore use life with love, and do not make your own life sour and heavy with vain and anxious cares.—Solomon does not say this to the secure and wicked children of the world, but to those truly fearing and believing God. These latter he consoles, and desires that they may cheerfully take comfort in God. To the former He says rejoice, but does not bid those to drink wine, eat, etc., who are but too much inclined to do so, and pass their lives in idleness and voluptuousness as wicked and depraved men.

ZEYSS (ver. 7):—The believers have more claim to the gifts of God than the unbelievers (1 Cor. iii. 21, 22), although they may enjoy them the least.—(ver. 9). Marriage is a sacred and wise ordinance of God; therefore the Christian may use it with a good conscience; but it must be enjoyed in the fear of God, Eph. v. 31. STARKE (ver. 8):—Arrogance, pride, and display in dress are very common vices in these latter times: the children of God find it very difficult to suppress these in themselves.—(ver. 10). The obligations that you owe to the body, you owe doubly to the soul. O man neglect not the labor due to thy soul; the night of death is coming when no one can work.—CRAMER (ver. 10):—We should perform the work of our calling with a resolute and confident spirit, and never hesitate in our charge.—HENGSTENBERG (ver. 10):—That we should do all that lies in our power is required by the facts that what we leave undone here below is never done, that the tasks placed upon us by God for this life, and which here remain unperformed, never find their performance, and that the gifts and powers conferred on us for this life must be used in this life.

Vers. 11 and 12. TÜBINGEN BIBLE:—Even in temporal things it does not depend upon any one's will or movements, but only on God's mercy. Everything is derived from God's blessing.—STARKE (ver. 12):—By his skill man can calculate the rising and setting of the sun; but human wisdom does not extend so far that one can tell when the sun of his life will rise or set.—HENGSTENBERG:—If it seems sad with the people of God when the world triumphs, let us reflect that such result does not depend on the might, or the weakness of men; and that a sudden catastrophe may overwhelm the highest, and cast him to the ground. Have we God for our friend? it all comes to that as the only thing that can decide.

Ver. 13-16. MELANCHTHON:—Such a poor man, in a city, was Jeremiah, as he himself writes, a man who saved the church in the midst of disorder and confusion. At the same time the precept admonishes us that good counsels are listened to by the few, whilst the worst please the many. And thus he says; The poor man's wisdom is despised.—CARTWRIGHT:—Wisdom, however splendid, if in lowly state, is so obscured by the cloud of poverty that in a brief time it has all eyes averted, and utterly falls from the memory.

CRAMER:—Thou shouldst laud no one on account of his high estate, and despise no one on account of his low estate. For the bee is a very little creature, and yet gives the sweetest fruit.—STARKE:—The heart of man is by nature so corrupt that to its own injury it is inclined to run after folly, and be disobedient to wisdom.—But true wisdom always finds those who know and love her. Though a wise man may for a time dwell in obscurity, he will nevertheless be drawn forth from it before he is aware. Wisdom of Solomon x. 13, 14.

APPENDIX.

[I. KOHELETH'S IDEA OF THE DEAD.—Chap. ix. 5:—

> The living know that they must die, the dead they nothing know;
> For them there is no more reward—forgotten is their name;
> Their love, their hate, their zeal, all perished now;
> Whilst the world lasts, no portion more have they
> In all the works performed beneath the sun.

STUART thinks that the Preacher "claims small merit for the living, merely the knowledge that they must die." "Is this," he asks, "better than not knowing any thing?" He argues, besides, that there is an inconsistency in such a view, made greater by the fact that this praise of life is one of the cheering passages, whereas such declarations as vii. 1; iv. 2-3 are from the desponding mood. Is not this, however, a mistake? The language here is gloomy, if not wholly desponding. Koheleth is perplexed and bewildered as he contemplates the apparent state of the dead, especially as it presents itself to the sense, inactive, motionless, silent, unheeding. He turns to the living, and surveys their condition, so full of vanity, with only the superiority of a little knowledge, one important element of which is a knowledge that this vanity must come to an end. It is just the survey that would give rise to that touching irony already spoken of, that mournful smile at human folly, in which a just contempt is blended with deepest sympathy,—an irony, not sneering, but tenderly compassionate, such as we find in some other Scriptures. As, for example, in Gen. iii. 22, where God is represented as ironically repeating the words of Satan, but in a spirit how different from that of the fiend! Ah, poor wretch! he knows it now, the difference between good and evil! See Gen., p. 240. So here, as though he had said, "Alas, their boasted knowledge! They know that they must die,—this is the substance of it, the remotest bound to which their science reaches." There is something of the same feeling in what is here affirmed of the state of the dead. It gloomily contemplates only the physical aspect, or the physical side of death, such as presents itself, sometimes, to the Christian, without any feeling of inconsistency, and without impairing that hope of future life which he possesses in a higher degree than Koheleth. We may even say that it is good for us, occasionally, to fix our minds on this mere physical aspect of our frail humanity.

> O when shall spring visit the mouldering urn?
> O when shall day dawn on the night of the grave?

It was not an infidel, but a devout believer, that wrote this. And so, too, there may be, at times, a sort of melancholy pleasure in thinking of death mainly in its aspect of repose from the toils and anxieties of the present stormy life; as in that mournful dirge so often sung at funerals—

> Unveil thy bosom, faithful tomb;
> Take this new treasure to thy trust;
> And give these sacred relics room
> To slumber in the silent dust.

> Nor pain, nor grief, nor anxious fear,
> Invade thy bounds; no mortal woes
> Can reach the peaceful sleeper here.

We feel no inconsistency between such strains, even when they assume a more sombre aspect, and that brighter view which the Christian takes in contemplating the spiritual side of our strange human destiny, or even as it sometimes presented itself to the Old Testament believer (Ps. xvi. 11; xvii. 15; lxxiii. 24). They no more jar upon our speculative theology than the language of our Saviour, John ix. 4: "The night cometh, when no man can work" [comp. Ecclesiastes ix. 10; xi. 8], or that touching language of the New Testament which represents death under the soothing conception of a sleep—κοίμησις—a lying down to rest. This term is not confined to the body, as the best exegesis would show, but would seem to denote also a most blessed state of quiescence for the spirit,—a state rudimental, imperfect, unfinished, anomalous, preparatory, yet most secure,—tranquil, yet not torpid—inactive, yet not inert—a holy conscious rest, a lying "under the shadow of the Almighty,"—separate from the present world, away from all its busy doings, if not from all its memories, and thus cradled again, nursed and educated, we may say, for that higher finished life, when death shall be fully conquered. He is the last and greatest enemy [1 Cor. xv. 26] who, until that time, retains some dominion over all humanity,—even over those "who sleep in Jesus," or "through Jesus," as it should be rendered,—the saved, or rather, the being saved [present participle. οἱ σωζόμενοι] the being healed, or made alive, as the Syriac has it, those in whom the redemptive life of Christ is overcoming death, and growing to the matured and perfect life of eternity. For it is clear, even from the New Testament, that this "state of death," or reign of death, still continues, in a certain sense, and in a certain degree, until the resurrection. Its power is over all men, and over the whole man, soul and body, although for the Christian, whose "life is hid with Christ in God" [Col. iii. 3], its sting is taken quite away. There is no mistaking the language, 1 Cor. xv. 54: ὅταν δὲ τὸ φθαρτὸν τοῦτο ἐνδύσηται ἀφθαρσίαν κ. τ. λ. It is only when this corruption puts on incorruption, and this mortal puts on immortality, that there is brought to pass the saying, "Death is swallowed up in victory." Till then, Death and Hades go together. One is but the continuation of the other. Being in Hades is being in the kingdom of the dead. Till then, the Old Testament idea still holds of death, not as extinction, non-existence. or not being [see Genesis, Notes, pp. 273, 586], but as a state, a state of positive being, though strange and inexplicable,—a state of continued personality, real though undefined, utterly unknown as to its condition, or only conceived of negatively as something that differs, in almost every respect, from the present active, planning, toiling, pleasure-grasping, knowledge-seeking life "beneath the sun." That there is something strange about it, something difficult to be thought, is intimated in our Saviour's language respecting the Old Testament saints, Luke xx. 38. πάντες γὰρ αὐτῷ ζῶσιν, "for they all live unto Him" [unto God],—as though what was called their life was something out of them, and could only be made dimly conceivable to us by this remarkable language. Compare the Jewish expression as we find it, 1 Sam. xxv. 29, and as it is interpreted and often quoted by Rabbinical writers, צְרוּרָה בִּצְרוֹר הַחַיִּים "bound up in the bundle of life with Jehovah thy God," or as the Vulgate renders it—anima custodita quasi in fasciculo viventium apud Dominum Deum tuum.

There is yet a reserve to the doctrine of the immediate after life, still a veil cast over it, we may reverently say, even in the New Testament. The most modern notions of a sudden transition to the highest Heavens, and to the perfect life, are, perhaps, as far to the one extreme, as the descriptions of mortality which Koheleth gives us, in his gloomy mood, may be in the other. This idea of the dead passing straightway into a busy active state of existence, in these respects resembling the present life, with its proud talk of progress, was unknown to the early Church, as its liturgies and funeral hymns most evidently show. See especially the earliest Syriac hymns, much of whose language the modern notions would render almost unintelligible. Christ has indeed "brought immortality to light," but it is chiefly by the doctrine of the resurrection, that great article so clear in the New Testament, though having its shadow in the Old. But there is another doctrine there, however little it is studied. We are taught that there was a work of Christ in Hades. He descended into Hades; he makes proclamation [ἐκήρυξεν] in Hades (1 Pet. iii. 19) to those who are there "in ward." He is our Christian Hermes, belonging to both worlds. He is the ψυχαγωγός, the conductor and guide of redeemed spirits in Hades, the "Shepherd and Bishop of souls" (1 Pet. ii. 15), the "Good Shepherd" (Ps. xxiii.), who leads his spiritual flock beside the still waters, in the Ge-tzalmaveth, the "valley of the death shade," or terra umbrarum, and, at the same time, the great High Priest above, to whom is "given all power in Heaven and in earth." He is the מלאך הגואל the Redeeming Angel of the Old Testament, to whom the righteous committed their spirits [Ps. xxxi. 6] and the Mediator more clearly revealed in the New.

The doctrine of the immediate after life, as we have said, has still a shadow cast upon it. We should not, therefore, wonder to find Koheleth still more under the veil. His very language implies continuance of being, in some way, although presenting a state of inactivity, and, in a word, a want of all participation in the doings and even memories of the present "life beneath the sun." It did not fall in the way of his musing to speak of differences, in this state, between the "righteous and the wicked;" but, in other passages of the Old Testament, it appears more clear, though still barely hinted, as in Prov. xiv. 32; Ps. lxxiii. 20; xlix. 15. It is a state in which the one is "driven away," whilst the other "has hope." Elsewhere, however [iii. 17: xii. 13, 14], Koheleth affirms his strong belief that at some time, and in some way, the two classes will be judged, and the difference between them most clearly manifested.

In the rhythmical version of ix. 10, חָכְמָה is rendered philosophy, because the writer seems, in this place, to take it in its more pretentious sense, or for human wisdom in distinction from the Divine,—speculative inquiry,—very much as Paul uses σοφία, sometimes, in the New Testament. And so, perhaps, we would come nearer to the intended force of the other word דַּעַת by rendering science, although not exactly corresponding to it in the most modern acceptation of the term. It is Paul's γνῶσις, "curious knowledge,"—not mere knowing, as consciousness, whether Koheleth held to any such consciousness or not. Comp. it with חֶשְׁבּוֹן (plan, reckoning) in immediate connection. So, too, even when speaking of the perfect psychological state (1 Cor. xiii. 8) Paul says of knowledge (γνῶσις), καταργηθήσεται—not, "it shall cease," as rendered, but "it shall be deposed"—put one side—no longer made the highest thing, as in this fallen life, where the intellectual is placed above the moral nature. In the blessed and perfect life to come, moral or spiritual contemplation, pervaded by ἀγάπη, shall be the highest exercise of the soul. Even the intermediate state is to be regarded as superior to the present existence in ontological rank, and the terms embryotic or rudimental, if applied to it, must be taken simply as denoting a formative state of repose, preparatory to the more glorious life that follows.—T. L.]

[II. THE ALLEGED EPICUREANISM OF KOHELETH. NOTE on chap. ix. 7–10, in connection with chap. xi. 9, 10. These passages have given rise to much comment. Stuart, with many others, regards the first of them as expressing the real advice which Koheleth would give in regard to the conduct of life, and then says: "In all this there is nothing Epicurean." What then is Epicureanism? Or how shall we distinguish? It would seem to be almost too sober a word. The language here used may almost be characterized as Anacreontic: "Eat with joy thy bread, and drink with mirth thy wine,—thy garments always white, and oil ne'er lacking to thy head:"

> Πίνωμεν, ὦ πίνωμεν—
> Τὸ ῥόδον τὸ καλλίφυλλον
> Κροτάφοισιν ἁρμόσαντες.

How, then, shall we avoid what seems to be on the very face of the passage? It will not do to resort to any special interpretation on account of a mere exigentia loci; although it might, with perfect truth, be said, that such Anacreontic advice is not only contrary to all the more serious portions of the Scriptures, Old and New; but also to the deeply solemn views in regard to human vanities, and the great awaiting judgment, that Koheleth himself has, in other places, so clearly expressed. All this outward argument, however, would not justify us in calling it irony, unless there were some internal evidence, something in the very style of the passage which called for such a conclusion. A careful examination, made in the spirit of the whole book, shows that there are such internal grounds of criticism. It was a feeling of this that led Jerome, the most judicious of the Patristic commentators, to call it a προσωποποιΐα, a personification, or dramatizing, more rhetorum et poetarum, or what the Jewish critics (see p. 71) called "the case speaking," the language of human life and human actions, in view of the pure earthliness of its condition. It is the language of the author so far as he puts himself forth as the representative of such a despairing state: quasi dixerit, O homo quia ergo, post mortem nihil es, dum vivis in hac brevi vita fruere voluptate, etc.: "O man since, after death, thou art nothing, then, whilst thou livest thy short life, enjoy pleasure, indulge in feasts, drown thy cares in wine, go forth adorned in raiment ever white (a sign of perpetual joy), let fragrant odors be ever breathing from thy head; take thy joy in female loveliness (quæcunque tibi placerent feminarum, ejus gaude complexu, et vanam hanc et brevem vitam vana et brevi voluptate percurre) and in brief pleasure pass this thy brief life of vanity," etc. He then represents Koheleth as retracting all this in the passage immediately following, where he says, "I turned again, and saw that the race was not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, nor wealth to the prudent, etc.," in other words, that thus to live in joy was not in man's power, but that all things happened as they were disposed by God: Hæc, aliquis inquit, loquatur Epicurus et Aristippus, et ceteri pecudes philosophorum, ego autem (inquit Koheleth) mecum diligenter retractans, invenio non est velocium cursus, nec fortium prælium, etc., etc.

There are two things in the passage itself that lead the serious reader to such a feeling, and such a view of its ironical, or, rather, its dramatic character. The first is the exuberance of the language, its extravagance, its Bacchanalian style, we might almost call it, inconsistent with, or certainly not demanded by, such a moderate, rational, sober view, or such a sober advice to live a contented life, as Stuart contends for, or, in other words, a judicious, virtuous Epicureanism. The joy so oft repeated, the mirth, the wine, the white raiment, the aromatic oils—what has such superlativeness of style to do with such a moderate, sober purpose? It was no more needed than the language which Euripides (Alcestis 800) puts into the mouth of Hercules when playing the Bacchanalian, and which this Solomonic irony so closely resembles:—

> Εὔφραινε σαυτὸν, πῖνε· τὸν καθ' ἡμέραν
> Βίον λογίζου σόν· τὰ δ' ἄλλα τῆς τύχης.
> Τίμα δὲ καὶ τὴν πλεῖστον ἡδίστην θεων.
> Οὔκουν, μεθ' ἡμῶν, τὴν λύπην ἄφεὶς, πίῃ,
> Στεφάνοις πυκασθεὶς κ. τ. λ.

> Make glad thy heart, drink wine, the life to-day
> Regard thine own; all else belongs to chance.
> In high esteem hold Love's delightful power.
> In social joy indulge—with chaplets crowned;
> And drive dull care away.

Hear Koheleth:

> Go then and eat with joy thy bread, and drink with mirth thy wine,
> In every season be thy garments white,
> And fragrant oil be never lacking to thy head;
> Live joyful with the wife whom thou hast loved.

The one kind of language seems but the echo of the other. If we disregard the spirit and the design of Koheleth, there is an Epicurean zest in his description, not surpassed, to say the least, by that of Euripides. We may say, too, on the other hand, that it is not easy to distinguish his language, and the spirit of it, from that of Paul in his quotation, 1 Cor. xv. 32: "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." If it be said that the context there makes it impossible for us to mistake the Apostle's ironical meaning, the same may be said in respect to the writer who tells us, only a short distance back,

> Better to visit sorrow's house, than seek the banquet hall;
> Better is grief than mirth;
> For in the sadness of the face the heart becometh fair.

It is the very nature of rhetorical irony, especially if it be the irony of sorrowful warning, to paint the thing in higher colors, we may say, than would suit its description in a more direct and didactic admonition. Had it been a piece of Isocratean moralizing in commendation of a moderate, contented, frugal, and thankful enjoyment of life, it would naturally have been in a lower and calmer strain. The wine, the odors, the splendid raiment, would have been all wanting. They are just the points in the picture, however, to make an impression on the serious mind when it is felt to be a description of the vanity of life. We may even say that they are just the things that lead to such a feeling.

The second internal evidence showing the true character of this passage, is the feeling of sorrow, which, amidst all its apparent joyousness, the writer cannot suppress. We have called it irony, but the irony of the Bible is not only serious, but sometimes most tender. Whilst, then, the language here criticised is not the mere worldly advice that Stuart and others would represent, neither is it, on the other hand, the hard irony of sarcasm, or of unpitying satire. Koheleth's thoughts of death, and its awful unknown, have depressed his faith, and there seems to have come over him a feeling akin to despair. His idea of God's justice, and of some great destiny, or world, over and encompassing the present, is not lost—for it reappears strongly afterwards—but, for the moment, the thought of man, as he is seen in the earthly state, becomes predominant, and he breaks out in this strain, in which pity is a very manifest element. "Go then and enjoy thy poor life." There is strong feeling in it, a most tender compassion, and this shows itself in that touching mention of the transient human state, and, especially, in the pathetic repetition of the words

> The days of thy vain life,—that life
> Which God hath given to thee beneath the sun;
> Yea, all thy days of vanity.

This plaintive tone is utterly inconsistent with the Epicurean interpretation, however moral and decent we may strive to make it.

Again, there are two arguments against such a view that may be said to be outside of the passage itself, though one of them is derived from another place in the book. First—in chap. xi. 9, 10, we have a strain so precisely similar, in style and diction, that we cannot help regarding it as possessing the same rhetorical character. It may be thus given metrically, yet most literally, and with the full force of every Hebrew word:

> Rejoice O youth in childhood; let thy heart
> Still cheer thee in the day when thou art strong;
> Go on in every way thy will shall choose,
> And after every form thine eyes behold.

It is not easy to mistake the character of this, even if it were not followed by that most impressive warning:

> But know that for all this, thy God will thee to judgment bring:
> O then turn sorrow from thy soul, keep evil from thy flesh;
> For childhood and the morn of life, they, too, are vanity.

Here the caution is clearly expressed, although we feel that such expression is just what the previous words, rightly comprehended in their spirit, would have led us to expect. Rhetorically regarded, such an addition would have been exactly adapted to this place (ix. 7–10). It would have been in harmony with the tone of what had gone before. It is, however, so suggested by the whole spirit of the passage, and especially by that irrepressible tone of commiseration that appears in the words before cited (the pathetic allusion to our poor vain life), that it may well be a question whether any such distinct warning, or any mere moralizing utterance, could have had more power than the "expressive silence" which leaves it wholly to the feeling and conscience of the reader.

The passage xi. 9, 10, is so important in itself, and has such a bearing on the one before us, as to justify its fuller interpretation in this place. Many modern commentators regard these verses also as a serious advice to the young man, if the term serious could, with any propriety, be applied to such an admonition. The older commentators, however, are mostly the other way. They regarded the passage as indeed most serious, but as having this character from its sharp yet mournful irony. So Geier says: "magnam interpretum partem hæc verba imperativa ironice accipere." Among these were Kimchi, Munsterus, Mercerus, Drusius, Junius, Piscator, Cartwright, Cajetan, Vatablus, Ar. Montanus, Osorius, Mariana, Menoch, Pineda, Jac. Mathiæ, and others, among whom may be reckoned Tremellius, if we may judge from the tone and style of his Latin translation. Luther was the other way, and it may be said that he has given the tone to many that have come after him, evangelical as well as rationalist. "This is said seriously by Solomon," he tells us, "de licita juventutis hilaritate, concerning the permitted joyfulness of youth, which ought not to be unbridled, or lascivious, but restrained within certain limits." But what right has he to say this? What limits are assigned? The language seems wholly without limitations, or reserve: "Walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes," terms which every where else in the Hebrew Scriptures are used, in malam partem, to denote sensual and ungodly conduct; as in Numb. xv. 39: "Ye shall not go (roam) אַחֲרֵי לְבַבְכֶם וְאַחֲרֵי עֵינֵיכֶם after your own heart, and after your eyes." Compare also the frequent phrase שְׁרִירוּת לֵב, commonly rendered "the imagination of the heart," but really meaning the turnings (choices) of the heart,—doing as one pleases. See Deut. xxix. 18; Ps. lxxxi. 13 where it is synonymous with יֵלְכוּ בְּמוֹעֲצוֹתֵיהֶם "walking in their own counsels," also Jerem. ix. 13, and other places. Compare especially Job xxxi. 7, where, for "the heart to follow the eye" is placed among the grievous sins, being regarded, in fact, as the very fountain-head of sin: אִם אַחַר עֵינַי הָלַךְ לִבִּי, "if my heart hath gone after mine eyes," the will (the conscience) after the choice, the velle after the optare, the voluntas after the voluptas. "Walk in the way of thine heart;" what an admonition this to a young man, even if such a one ever needed an exhortation to hilarity, or to the following of his own pleasure! How strange, too, as coming from one who, in other parts of this book, talks so differently: "Better the house of mourning than the house of feasting;" "I said of laughter it is mad, of mirth, O what availeth it!" Compare it with the repeated charge of Solomon, in the Proverbs, to restrain the young man—not to let him go after the imaginations of his heart, to put a bridle on him (חנך Prov. xxii. 6), and "bow down his neck in his youth." The language here is peculiar, and each word must be sharply looked to: "Go on" (it is הַלֵּךְ, the piel intensive) "keep going, in the ways (all the ways, in the plural, every way) of thine heart," וּבְמַרְאֵי עֵינֶיךָ (the k'tib is undoubtedly right) and in (or after) the forms of thine eyes." The word מַרְאֶה is so frequently used of female beauty (see the phrase יְפַת מַרְאֶה Gen. xii. 11, and other places) that the idea is at once suggested here; and what a contrast then to our Saviour's teaching, that even to look is sin. What a contrast, we may say, is the whole of it thus considered, to what Christ says about the broad way, and to St. John's most emphatic language (1 Epist. ii. 16) respecting "the lust of the eye," the desire of the eye, τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν! If we give the phrase the more general rendering, "the sight of the eyes (sight objectively) it would come to the same thing It would be a license to follow every form of beauty. There might be urged, too, the contrast between it (thus regarded as serious advice even in the most decent sense that could be given to it) and Paul's counsel for young men, Titus ii. 6, τοὺς νεωτέρους παρακάλει σωφρονεῖν, "exhort them to be sober," temperate, sound-minded, having reason and conscience ruling over appetite and desire. How unlike, too, the Psalmist's direction cxix. 9, "Wherewith shall a young man cleanse his way,—by taking heed thereto (לִשְׁמֹר), by watching it, according to Thy word." How utterly opposed to this is the unlimited advice to the young man "to walk in the way of his heart," that is, to do as he pleases. Luther feels the force of this contrast, for he says in the same comment, when he comes to speak of the words ותלך בדרכי לבך "walk in the ways of thine heart," fecit hic locus ut totum hunc textum ironiam esse putarem, quia ferme in malam partem sonat, siquis incedat in via cordis sui: "This place would make me think that the whole text was irony, because the phrase 'to walk in the way of one's heart,' is so generally taken in a bad sense." But, after all, he goes on to say that we must abide by the general idea of the passage (as he had taken it) and suppose the necessary limitations. Very few commentators have had a clearer perception than Luther of the general sense of the Scripture, but in regard to such passages as these he is not to be implicitly trusted. He was of a very jovial disposition; but what chiefly led him to such interpretations, here and elsewhere in this book, was his aversion to some of the more austere dogmas, as well as practices of Romanism, and especially his dislike of asceticism, as exhibited by the Monks. Hence he allowed himself too much to be driven towards the opposite extreme. Thus in his commenting on the words במראה עיניך, "in the sight of thine eyes," he boldly says, quod offertur oculis tuis hoc fruere, ne fias similis Monachorum, etc.: "whatever is offered to your eyes, that freely enjoy, lest you become like the monks who would not have one even look at the sun." And so in the beginning of the passage, ver. 9: non prohibet jucunditates sive voluptates, quemadmodum stulti monachi fecerunt, etc.: "It does not prohibit delights nor pleasures, as the foolish monks have done, which is nothing else than making stocks of young men (even as ANSELM says, ille monachissimus monachus, that most monkish monk), or than attempting to plant a tree in a narrow pot." Others of the Reformers and early Protestant commentators were influenced in the same way in following LUTHER, and there can be no doubt that this has much affected their interpretations of Koheleth, making him talk like an Epicurean, and then denying that it was Epicureanism, or trying to throw over it a decent ethical mantle by their unwarranted hypotheses and limitations. After they have done their best, however, in this way, they make this writer of Holy Scripture to be a moralist inferior to SOCRATES and SENECA, who certainly never thought that a young man needed any such advice as that. The pious GEIER seems to be aware of the suggestions that might arise from other parts of Scripture, and would zealously guard this virtuous Solomonic young man, who needs such a caution against excessive sobriety, from any comparison with the Prodigal Son, Luke xv. But what did he do, that filius perditus, that spendthrift, ille heluo, as GEIER calls him, except "to walk in the ways of his heart, and in the sight of his eyes?" What is all pleasure-seeking selfishness [φιλαυτία, φιληδονία, 2 Tim. iii. 2-4] but saying "give unto me my portion of goods that falleth to me," in this world?

It might have been thought, however, that the latter part of ver. 10, following the warning of judgment, would have been treated in a different manner; but the general consistency of which LUTHER speaks has led some to an Epicurean interpretation even of this. We regret to find our author ZÖCKLER following such a course in his interpretation of the words הסר כעס מלבך "turn away sorrow from thy heart." "Here," he says, "the positive exhortation to hilarity (Frölichsein) is followed by a dissuasion from its opposite,"—that is, the young man is told to avoid seriousness as painful and troublesome (Kummer, Unmuth,) which he gives as the interpretation of כַּעַס]. It is a recommendation of hilarity, of mirth, in opposition to asceticism or undue sobriety, as though the young man's danger in Solomon's time, or in the days of Malachi, or at any other period in the human history, had been in that direction of gloom and monkery.

There are few interpreters more honest, or more learned, than STUART, and yet his comment here is certainly a very strange one. "In verse 9th," he tells us, "the command is to do something positive in the way of enjoyment; here it is to shun evil and suffering. Taking both together, the amount is, enjoy all that a rational man can enjoy in view of retribution, and avoid all the evil and suffering that can be avoided." Retribution here is a mere make weight. Why retribution for simply acting according to the advice? If pleasure be the good, then, as that acute moralist SOCRATES says, "he who gets the most of it is the ἀγαθὸς ἀνὴρ, the good man, the best man." "But why," asks STUART, "is this so strongly urged upon the young?" The question is certainly one that is very naturally suggested in view of such an interpretation, but the answer he gives is remarkable: "Plainly because that even they, although in the best estate of man, hold life by a very frail tenure. Therefore, as even youth is so frail and evanescent, make the best of it. It is almost as if he had said—Then or never." In other words, a short life and a merry one. ANACREON could not have said it better. No exhortation to obedience to parents, to temperance, to sober-mindedness, in the style of Paul, no advice to "watch over the heart," such as Solomon gives in the Proverbs, but a direction "to walk in the sight of the eyes," and a caution against seriousness as inconsistent with youthful hilarity. Strange advice this under any circumstances; and still more strange from the fact that it is the only place in the book in which young men are addressed,—the first verse of chap. xii. being but a continuation of the admonition here given. Look at the argument as it thus presents itself: God will bring thee unto judgment, young man; therefore put away all serious concern from thy heart. And why? Because youth is brief and evanescent. How does it compare Scripturally with the other view as presenting the other reasoning: Know that God will bring thee into judgment for "following the ways of thine heart, and walking in the sight of thine eyes;" therefore "turn sorrow from thy heart" [thy soul], that is the feeling of remorse, the sense of the Divine displeasure, or of thine own self-accusing indignation [כַּעַס] for such an unrestrained living to thyself, and "keep off [הַעֲבֵר, avert] evil from thy flesh"—that is, the bodily ills that must come from a life of sensuality, or following "the desire of thy heart," and "the voluptuous sight of thine eyes." And why? Because "childhood and youth [שַׁחֲרוּת, literally, the morn of life] are vanity;" that is, all their joys, take them at the highest, are vain and worthless in comparison with the serious evils, whether for this life or another, that such a course of free indulgence may bring upon thee.

The ironical nature of this passage is accepted by that great critic, GLASSIUS, in the Philologia Sacra, p. 1518. It is an "apostrophe," he says, "a concessio ironica cujus correctio, a consuetudine animi et sensuum prava revocans, statim subjungitur:" Go on,—but know. He compares it with Isaiah ii. 10, "enter into the rock, and hide thyself in the dust," but know that God will find thee. So Isaiah viii. 9, "Join yourselves together, enter into council, but know that it will be all in vain." It is equivalent to saying, "though ye do this,"—the imperative being really the statement of an hypothesis. Another passage he cites is Isaiah xxi. 5: "Spread the table, set the watch, eat, drink," etc.; though that may be taken in a different way.

A second outside proof of the true character of the language, Eccles. ix. 7-10, is derived from a passage in the Apocryphal book entitled Wisdom of Solomon. It is evidently an imitation of these very verses, and, whether written by a Jew or a Christian, is evidence of the earliest mode of interpreting all such modes of speaking in Koheleth. It is the language of the worldly pleasure-seeker, chap. ii. vers. 6-8: "Come then, and let us enjoy the good that is before us; let us be filled with costly wine and aromatic odors; let no flower of the spring pass by us; let us crown ourselves with roses before they be withered," etc. The imitation is evident throughout the passage. It appears not only from the language used, but also from the fact that the writer, both by his general style and by the title he has given to his book, intended it as a more full and florid setting forth of what he deemed the pervading thought and feeling of Koheleth. Now, by placing this same style of language in the mouth of the sensualist, he makes clear that he was of like opinion with JEROME (whose views may have been derived from his Hebrew teacher representing the same view afterwards advanced by Kimchi), that as uttered by Koheleth, it was a προσωποποιία, a dramatic representing of what is expressed in human action,—the sensualist's own conduct speaking forth the view of life that would be in accordance with the idea that this is all of man, and that there is no such judgment as that on which Koheleth elsewhere so strongly insists. This is rendered still more clear from the sudden change that immediately follows in ver. 11, and which JEROME justly characterizes as Koheleth retractans. He cannot let the language go without showing how full of vanity it is, viewed only in regard to the present world, and according to the known condition of human life:

I turned again to look beneath the sun.
Not to the swift the race, I saw, nor victory to the strong,
Nor to the wise secure their bread, nor to the prudent wealth.

The very uncertainty of all human efforts renders such advice utterly vain. Why say to men, be happy, eat, drink, and be merry, "let thy garments be ever white, and let aromatic oils be never lacking to thy head," when no strength, no wisdom, can give any security for the avoidance of sorrow, much less for the attainment of such Epicurean joys. In such a connection the thought of there being, necessarily for man, a judgment and a destiny, making all such pleasures, even if innocent, mere vanity and worthlessness in the comparison, is more powerfully suggested than it would have been by the most express utterance.

There are some other things of less exegetical importance, but deserving of attention in their bearing on the real character of these important passages. Thus the words כִּי כְבָר רָצָה

הָאֱלֹהִים אֶת־מַעֲשֶׂיךָ [ix. 7] are rendered in E. V.: "God now accepteth thy works," indicating that He has, in some way, become gracious. The true rendering is, "God hath already," or rather, "long ago, accepted thy works." It is a thing of the past, settled as the Divine way in regard to man; He has never been offended at all. It is the doctrine of Plato's second class of atheists (as he calls them, though they claim to be theists), who believe in a Divine power, but regard Him as taking no account of men, or rather, as accepting all human works, as He accepts the operations of nature. Or it is a Hebraistic form of the Lucretian doctrine of the Divine nature:

Semota ab nostris rebus, sejunctaque longe.

That this general acceptance by Deity of human works is not the serious language of Koheleth, is evident from his so frequent insisting on judgment, either in this world or in another, as though it were his favorite doctrine, his "one idea," we might say, in all this discourse. So WORDSWORTH regards the whole passage as the language of the sensualist (which is the same as JEROME's ironical προσωποποιία, or Koheleth speaking in their person), and thus comments on the words in question: "Evil men misconstrue their prosperity into a sign that God accepts their works." There is, however, too much inferential moralizing in such a statement. In their language, God's "accepting their works" is rather another mode of saying that He is utterly indifferent about them, or, as they would represent in their Lucretian hyperpiety, too great, too exalted, to mind the affairs of men.

The 10th verse of ch. ix. is rendered in E. V.: "Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." The Vulgate favors this, but the accents forbid it. They connect בכחך with לעשות, requiring us, if we follow them, to render: "whatever thy hand findeth to do in thy strength, do it." This puts a different aspect upon the sentence, and the accents, with their usual nice discrimination, bring it out. The other rendering would indeed suggest a similar meaning, but the accents make it clear. It becomes the maxim, τὸ κράτιστον τὸ δίκαιον, might makes right, or let might be thy law of right, or as it is rendered in the Metrical Version,—

Do, then, whate'er thy hand shall find in thy own might to do.

WORDSWORTH takes the same view: "Do all that thy hand findeth to do by thy power" [see HENGSTENBERG, EWALD]; that is, "let might be right with thee; care nothing for God or man, but use thy strength according to thy will." Surely this is not the serious language of the serious Koheleth, the earnest teacher of judgment, who speaks so solemnly of "the fear of God, and who says, only two verses from this: "Then I turned again to look beneath the sun, and saw that the race was not to the swift nor the victory to the strong."

The language following: "For there is no knowledge," etc., even STUART regards as that of the objector, though replying to the serious advice given above, as though he had said in addition: enjoy thyself, etc., for there is no after state to give thee uneasiness. "But we have seen," says STUART, "that the settled opinion of Koheleth himself [viii. 12, 13] was something quite different from this." It is not easy to understand the remark. It would have furnished STUART a much more consistent ground of reasoning, had he regarded the whole passage as irony or personification. He says, at the close of his comment on the verses: "The positive passages which show Koheleth's view of judgment, and of retribution, are too strong to justify us in yielding to suggestions of this nature"—that is, the supposition of his denial of all future accountability. This rule of criticism, had they consistently followed it, would have made Koheleth all clear in many places where the opposite method produces inextricable confusion and contradiction.

Such remarks as ZÖCKLER and STUART sometimes make in deprecation of Epicureanism [HITZIG, in general, gives himself no concern about it] show the pressure upon evangelical commentators (and even upon all who may in a true sense be styled rational), when they adopt what may be termed the half-way Lutheran mode. The doctrine of Epicurus, even in its most decent form, is so inconsistent with any devout fear of God, and this again is so utterly alien to any philosophic or scientific theism that maintains a Deity indifferent to human conduct, one who cannot be prayed to, ἀνευκταῖος, and without any judgment either in this world or another; for in respect to the true nature of Koheleth's exhortation, either idea presents a conclusive argument. His doctrine must be somehow connected with all that system of truth, with all that "wisdom, of which the fear of the Lord is the beginning." To a mind deeply meditative like that of Koheleth, the thought of there being no judgment, no hereafter (should such a belief be ever forced upon it), would not be ground of joy, much less of an exhortation to joy, as addressed to others. He would not, even in that case, adopt the Epicurean maxim: Let us eat and drink,—rather let us fast, let us mourn, in view of an existence so brief, so full of vanity, so soon to go out in darkness all the more dense, a despair all the more painful, in consequence of the transient light of reason with which we are so strangely and irrationally endowed—e tenebris in tenebras—like the bubble on the wave in a stormy night, reflecting for a moment all the starry hosts above, and then going out forever. There is no religion, no superstition, no creed so awfully serious, as that of human extinction, and of a godless world. Place the two exhortations side by side: Live in the fear of God, for thou must come to judgment: Live joyful, for soon thou wilt be no more; in either alternative, the present value of the present being, considered for its own sake, dwindles in a rational estimate. As connected with a greater life to come, though made important by such connection, yet how comparatively poor! regarded as the whole of our existence, how absolutely vain! In the first aspect, it is vanitas; in the second, it is vanitas vanitatum, utterly vain, a "vanity of vanities." The Epicurean idea and the Epicurean call to mirth are as inconsistent with the one as with the other.—T. L.]

B.—In Presence of the Insolence, Bold Assumption and Violence of Fortunate and Influential Fools, the Wise Man can only Preserve his Peace of Soul by Patience, Silence and Tranquility.

CHAP. IX. 17—X. 20.

1. Of the advantage of a wise tranquility over the presumptuous insolence of fools.

(IX. 17—X. 4.)

17 The words of wise men are heard in quiet more than the cry of him that ruleth
18 among fools. Wisdom is better than weapons of war: but one sinner destroyeth
1 much good. Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour: so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour.
2, 3 A wise man's heart is at his right hand; but a fool's heart is at his left. Yea also, when he that is a fool walketh by the way, his wisdom faileth him, and he
4 saith to every one that he is a fool. If the spirit of the ruler rise up against thee, leave not thy place; for yielding pacifieth great offences.

2. Of the advantage of quiet, modest wisdom over the externally brilliant but inconstant fortune of fools.

(VERS. 5–10.)

5 There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, as an error which proceedeth
6, 7 from the ruler: Folly is set in great dignity, and the rich sit in low place. I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth.
8 He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it; and whoso breaketh an hedge, a serpent 9 shall bite him. Whoso removeth stones shall be hurt therewith; and he that 10 cleaveth wood shall be endangered thereby. If the iron be blunt, and he do not whet the edge, then must he put to more strength: but wisdom is profitable to direct.

3. Of the advantage of the silence and persevering industry of the wise man over the loquacity and indolence of fools.

(VERS. 11–20.)

11 Surely the serpent will bite without enchantment; and a babbler is no better.
12 The words of a wise man's mouth are gracious; but the lips of a fool will swallow 13 up himself. The beginning of the words of his mouth is foolishness: and the end 14 of his talk is mischievous madness. A fool also is full of words: a man cannot 15 tell what shall be; and what shall be after him, who can tell him? The labour of the foolish wearieth every one of them, because he knoweth not how to go to 16 the city. Wo to thee, O land, when thy king is a child, and thy princes eat in the 17 morning! Blessed art thou, O land, when thy king is the son of nobles, and thy

*[V. 8. גּוּמָּץ. A ditch, or pit, Vulg., fovea, LXX. βόθρον. The Syriac Version has the same word. It is, however, no more Aramaic than Hebrew, being rare in both languages, though the verb, signifying to dig, is found in the latter. Its form is unusual in having dagesh after shurek, as is noted in the margin.—T. L.]

[Ver. 9. יִסָּכֶן; for יִשָּׂכֶן, a denominative from שַׂכִּין, "a knife," and, therefore, having no relation to the verb סכן as found, with quite a different meaning Job xxii. 2; xxxiii. 3; xv. 3; Isaiah xxii. 15, etc. Lit., "shall be cut," or, "may be cut thereby." It is another example of variant orthography, showing that the first manuscripts of this work were written from the ear. See remarks on שִׂכְלוּת and similar words, page 116.—T. L.]

[Ver. 10. קִלְקַל; the sense of swinging, which Zöckler, Hitzig, and Elster give to this word, is not confirmed by Ezek. xxi. 26, to which they refer. Gesenius gives the sense to sharpen, polish, but derives it from the primary idea of light moving, as in the rapid motions of a whet-stone, which is very probable. The accents connect it with פָּנִים faces, edges, though the Vulgate and LXX have disregarded it.—T. L.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Of the three sections of this division, as we lay them down in essential conformity with Vaihinger, the first compares the entire nature of the wise man with that of the fool, whilst the second draws a parallel between the two regarding the conditions of their happiness; but the third points out the more profound* causes of their opposite destinies in two special qualities of both (the loquacity and indolence of fools, and the opposite of these faults in the wise man). This train of thought is less clear on account of the peculiar form of the sentences,—nearly all being proverbs of two lines, concise in extent, and significant and aphoristic in character;—but it must not therefore be disregarded, nor displaced by the acceptance of an incongruity of plan or connection, as if it were a conglomerate of many groups of maxims or of separate proverbs with no internal connection. By an atomistic and disintegrating process, this section has been divided by Hengstenberg into five divisions, by Hahn into eight, and by Elster even into nine; (1) ix. 17—x. 1; (2) x. 2, 3; (3) ver. 4; (4) vers. 5–7; (5) vers. 8–10; (6) vers. 11–14; (7) ver. 15; (8) vers. 16–19; (9) ver. 20; we shall present the special refutation of this system in our illustrations of the words and sense of the individual verses.

2. First strophe. Chap. ix. 17—x. 4. Of the patient and tranquil nature of the wise man in contrast with the arrogant insolence and irascibility of the fool.—The words of wise men are heard in quiet more than the cry of him that ruleth among fools. Observe the connection with the section immediately preceding, vers. 13–16, which shows the superiority of wisdom by a single example. But this verse opens a new section in so far as it begins to treat specifically of tranquility as a characteristic and cardinal virtue of the wise man. He who hears in quiet, proves himself thereby a lover of quiet and tranquility, and therefore a wise man. A quiet attention to wise words is a condition necessary to their practical obedience, and consequently to becoming wise and acting wisely. The counterpart of this is shown by the boisterous and passionate cry of the "ruler among fools," i. e., not absolutely of the "foolish ruler" (Vaihinger, etc., referring to Ps. liv. 6; Job xxiv. 13, ff.), but of a ruler who, as he rules over fools, is foolish himself; comp. chap. x. 16. Elster correctly observes: "Two pictures are here compared, the wise man among his scholars, who receive his teachings with collected attention, and thoughtful quiet, and a ruler wanting in wisdom to control, and who, in undignified and boisterous ostentation, issues injudicious commands to those who execute them quite as *[These ethical and logical divisions are not easy to trace. The different methods adopted by different commentators, warrant a strong suspicion of their reality. There is, doubtless, a connection in the thought, but it is poetical rather than logical, suggestive rather than formally didactic. In the Metrical Version there is an attempt to group into separate cantos the thoughts that seemed to have the nearest relation to each other; but these might, perhaps, be differently arranged, and with equal effect. The mind of the author may be regarded under different aspects. And so, too, of the reader, it may be said, that the division for him may depend very much on his own spiritual state: for it is the very nature of all such musing, emotional writing, to suggest more to one mind than to another. It may even give a wider and a higher train of thought to the reader than the writer himself possessed: and that too legitimately, or without any violence to the text; for there is a spirit in words witnessing with our spirits, and, under favorable spiritual circumstances, there may be seen a light in our author's language which he did not see, or but dimly saw, himself. And this we may suppose to have been the very design of the higher or divine author, in giving such a dramatic or representative work a place in His holy written revelation. The whole book is a meditation, or a series of meditations. The thoughts do not, indeed, follow each other arbitrarily; but, like our best thinking, are connected more by emotional than by logical bands. Place ourselves in the same subjective state—read it as poetry, not as a formal didactic ethical treatise—and we shall readily see what there is in each part, in each verse, in a single word sometimes, that makes the writer think of what follows, though all logical, or even rhetorical criticism might fail to find it. (See remarks p. 176). Take, for example, these verses of the ix. and x. chapters, as apparently the most disconnected of any in the whole poem. The ever-recurring, or underlying thought is wisdom in its two apparently contradictory aspects of preciousness and vanity—wisdom, of such inestimable value in itself as compared with folly, and yet, through folly, rendered so unavailing. The episodal mention of "the poor wise man" leads on the general train of thought, but it immediately suggests (ver. 7) how one sinner (one fool) may destroy its effect upon a community. This prompts the parallel thought, how, in the individual, too, a little folly taints all his better acquisitions,—the mode of expressing this being, doubtless, a favorite proverbial form commending itself less for its nicety than for its exquisite appositeness. This again makes him think how readily the fool exposes his folly; as the most striking example of which there occurs to the mind the rashness with which such bring upon themselves the displeasure of the ruler. Then comes readily up the folly of rulers themselves,—then examples of it in subverting the proper relations of life. A pause, perhaps, occurs; some links pass silently through the mind, but the chain of thought still shows itself. It is transferred from the higher to the more ordinary avocations of life. It is still the unavailingness of human wisdom. With all our care, and all our skill, there is danger everywhere, liability to mistakes and mishaps in every business, and in every act. Another pause; it is the same thought but it takes a different form—the unavailingness of eloquence, or the gift of speech [that splendid evil, ὁ κόσμος τῆς ἀδικίας, Jas. iii. 6, or "ornament of unrighteousness"]. Here, too, there is to be traced the influence of the proverbial association: "the serpent bites without enchantment;" so is the gift of speech to its possessor when misemployed in vain babbling or in slander. In such a tracking of ideas and emotions, the transitions may seem slight and even fanciful; but they are more natural, more sober, more impressive, we may say, in their moral and didactic effect, than those formal, logical divisions which commentators so confidently propose, and in which they so greatly differ. Other readers may be differently affected, so that they discover in it other associations of thought [for there are various ways, lying below the soul's direct consciousness, in which our spiritual movements link themselves together] but such diversity of view, it may be said, arises from the very nature of this kind of subjective writing, and is evidence of excellency in it rather than of a defect. It comes from its very suggestiveness, and shows the rich fertility inherent in its germs of thought.—T. L.]

injudiciously. Comp. the mild and tranquil nature of the servant of God, with the criers in the streets: Isa. xlii. 2; Matt. xii. 19.—Ver. 18. Wisdom is better than weapons of war; i. e., it is stronger, more effective, and indomitable than the greatest physical strength and warlike preparation, קְרָב poetical, and equivalent to מִלְחָמָה comp. Ps. lv. 19; Dan. vii. 21; and therefore, כְּלֵי־קְרָב as elsewhere we have כְּלֵי מִלְחָמָה, not merely weapons of war (Vulgate: arma bellica; ELSTER, et al.), but implements of war, warlike instruments, and apparatus, war material in general (LXX σκεύη πολέμου).—But one sinner destroyeth much good. "One sinner," i. e., a single one of those coarse miscreants or fools, who can command physical strength, but are destitute of wisdom. There certainly can be no intention to make a special allusion to the "heathen world-monarch," i. e., the Persian king (HENGSTENBERG), nor in the expression, "much good" is there any reference to the prosperity of the Persian realm. This expression טוֹבָה הַרְבֵּה can rather be only intended to show what is homogeneous with wisdom and belonging to it, consequently the salutary creations and measures of wisdom, its blessings in the various spheres of the civil, and, especially, of the moral life of men.—Nine manuscripts read וְחֵטְא instead of וְחוֹטֶא "and one sin destroyeth much good;" but the connection imperatively demands the retention of the Masoretic reading. —Chap. x. 1. Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour. Literal, "flies of death," etc. The singular יַבְאִישׁ, with the plural זְבוּבֵי, is to be taken distributively: each individual dead fly can make the ointment stink, as soon as it falls into it. For this construction comp. Hosea iv. 8; Prov. xvi. 2; Song of Solomon ii. 9; GESENIUS, Lehrgebäude, pp. 665, 713. יַבִּיעַ means literally "turns into liquid, causes to bubble up," i. e., sets into fermentation, and in that way produces the decomposition and rottenness of the ointment. רוֹקֵחַ, dealer in spices. This addition gives us to understand that the valuable ointment of commerce is meant, and by no means a worthless article.—So doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honor. [ZÖCKLER's comment is based upon his translation: "Weightier than wisdom, than honor, is a little folly,"* which is essentially different from our English Version.—T. L.] יָקָר is here used in its original signification "heavy, weighty," namely, in the eyes of the dazzled multitude, that is, accustomed to esteem folly, and indeed a very small amount of folly, of more value than all real wisdom and honor. "Wisdom and honor" correspond in this second clause to the costly ointment of the first, and the "little folly" (כְּעָט) corresponds to the fly, the little dead animal, that nevertheless corrupts the whole pot of ointment; comp. 1 Cor. v. 6.—Ver. 2. After ver. 1 has explained and developed the second clause of ix. 18, the author turns back to the illustration of the great advantages of wisdom over folly, that is, to the first clause of ix. 18. A wise man's heart is at his right hand. That is, it is in the right place, whilst the fool's is really at the left, i. e, has sinister and perverse purposes. "Heart" is here equivalent to judgment, as in the subsequent verse, and in Prov. ii. 2; xiv. 33; xv. 28.—Ver. 3. Yea also, when he that is a fool walketh by the way, his wisdom faileth him. That is, when he goes out he lets people perceive his want of judgment in various ways—for which reason he would do much better to remain at home with his stupidity.—And he saith to every one that he is a fool. Namely, because he considers himself alone wise, and as a fool he can do no otherwise; for as soon as he should consider himself a fool, he would have made the beginning of his return to the path of wisdom. KNOBEL, EWALD, and VAIHINGER render; "it is foolish." But סָכָל stands elsewhere only for persons; for the adjective sense it would be necessary to assume the reading סֶכֶל.—Ver. 4 is not a specific maxim incidentally dropped, (ELSTER) but an admonition holding the closest connection with what precedes, and which forms the practical conclusion of the whole discussion (beginning with ix. 17) concerning the relation between wise gentleness and foolish passionateness. For the ruler among fools (ix. 17) here clearly appears again as "ruler;" the "great offences" point back to the "sinner" of ix. 18; and thus also is there made a close connection with vers. 2 and 3 of this chapter. Hence LUTHER is correct in his rendering: "Therefore, when the insolence of a mighty one," etc. If the spirit of the ruler rise up against thee. For the expression רוּחַ תַּעֲלֶה עַל in which רוּחַ does not mean spirit (Sept., Vulg., HENGSTENBERG), but anger, comp. 2 Sam. xi. 12; Ps. lxxviii. 21; Ezek. xxxviii. 18.—Leave not thy place; i. e., do not be disconcerted, do not become dissatisfied, as this would develop itself in a changed position of thy body in a manner that would entail danger on thee. In this obvious illustration it is not necessary, with HITZIG, to explain מְקוֹמְךָ by "thy condition of soul, thy usual state of mind,"—an interpretation for which the appeal to the soul—"maintain thy place"—in the Arabian story of the "Golden Necklace," scarcely affords a sufficient reason.—For yielding pacifieth great offences, i. e., prevents them, smothers them in the birth, and does not let them come to light. We find similar sentences in Prov. x. 12; xv. 1; xxv. 15.

*[The objections to the rendering of ZÖCKLER, HITZIG, STUART, and others, are 1st: the unusual meaning "heavier," which it gives to יָקָר, a sense existing primarily in the root, and appearing in the Syriac and the Arabic, but having no other example in the Hebrew; 2d, the filling up, or supposed ellipsis ("in the eyes of the ignorant and foolish"), which is required if we give it the more common Hebrew significance of "precious, honorable;" 3d, and chiefly, the singular incongruity that, by either of these authors, is introduced into the comparison: "as the dead fly taints the precious ointment, so a little folly outweighs wisdom," etc., or, is more precious in the vulgar opinion. It is evidently a comparison in either rendering, though the particle of comparison is omitted, as in many other cases, especially of the concise sententious kind [see the long list in the Grammar of JONA BEN GANNACH]. The objection to the common English rendering (which is also that of GEIER, TREMELLIUS, and the great critic GLASSIUS) is that it requires a repetition of יַבְאִישׁ in the second member; but for such ellipsis, especially in proverbial expressions, and when the context evidently favors it, there is good and clear authority. Comp. Prov. xiii. 2: "From the fruit of his mouth a man shall eat good, but the soul of the wicked—folly;" that is, shall eat folly [with ellipsis of תֹּאכַל]. Comp. Prov. xxvi. 9; Jerem. xvii. 11. A still stronger case is found, Job xxiv. 19, where there is, in fact, a double ellipsis. and yet the comparison and the meaning are both quite clear: "Heat carries off the snow waters, Sheol—have sinned;" that is, so "sheol (carries off those that) have sinned"— שאול חטאו. There is an ellipsis both of the governing verb, and of the relative pronoun. "The dead fly taints the fragrant ointment, so a little folly [taints] one honorable for wisdom," etc. Nothing could be more apt, or true. This rendering preserves also the analogy between a good name and precious odors, a metaphor common in all languages, and so strikingly introduced vii. 1, and Cant. i. 3: Dead flies spoil the fragrant ointment, a little folly the good name. This is in accordance, too, with a common usage in Hebrew, by which the sense of הִבְאִישׁ is transferred from the literal ill savor to odiousness of character. The preposition מ with the sense of propter, on account of, is also well established: יָקָר מֵחָכְמָה מִכָּבוֹד, "precious," that is, held in esteem "for wisdom and honor." The two verbs יַבִּיעַ and יַבְאִישׁ are to be taken together, or the one as qualifying the other: "make corrupt, make ferment," or froth, that is, corrupt by fermentation—"with frothy taint." See Metrical Version.—T. L.]

8. Second strophe. Vers. 5-10. Of the apparent but inconstant fortune of fools, and of the superiority of the modest, but effective and sterling influence of wisdom.—For ver. 5, first clause, comp. chap. vi. 1.—As an error which proceedeth from the ruler. By the comparative כְּ in כִּשְׁגָגָה, the evil in the first clause is marked as one that is not simply an error of a ruler, but which only appears as such, manifests itself as such, so as to draw after it much worse evils, (EWALD is correct in translating, "apparently in error"). We can also understand this כְּ as כְּ veritatis, and either leave it untranslated (as ELSTER, according to LUTHER and many older authors) or give it through our turn: "there is an evil in respect to an error" (HITZIG); it is then indicated that the particular action in question corresponds to the general idea of an evil (רָעָה); compare 2 Sam. ix. 8.—The explanations of KNOBEL, VAIHINGER, and HAHN are censurable in making כְּ equivalent to the expressions "according to, or in consequence of which;" as are also those of HENGSTENBERG, who, following the example of HIERONYMUS and a Jewish adept in Scripture learning whom he questioned, understands the term "ruler" (הַשַּׁלִּיט) to be God, and thence thinks of an act of divine power that seems like a fault, but is none,—an interpretation which is untenable on account of the manifest identity of שַׁלִּיט with מוֹשֵׁל in ver. 4.—Vers. 6 and 7 give two examples of errors of rulers.—Folly is set in great dignity; namely, by the caprice of a ruler who elevates an unworthy person to the highest honors of his realm. נִתַּן lit., "is given, is set," comp. Esther vi. 8; Deut. xvii. 15. The abstract הַסֶּכֶל stands for the concrete הַסָּכָל which the Septuagint, Vulgate, etc., seem to have read directly, but which is not therefore to be put in the place of the Masoretic text, because the latter gives a much stronger thought; it is not simply a fool, it is personified folly.—And the rich sit in low place, i. e., by virtue of those very despotic acts of a despotic ruler, the rich (i. e., the noble and distinguished, whose wealth is patrimonial and just,) homines ingenuos nobiles (comp. ver. 20, as also the synonym בֶּן־חוֹרִים ver. 17) are robbed of their possessions and driven from their high places. HITZIG says: "Sudden and immense changes of fortune proceeding from the person of the ruler are peculiar to the East, the world of despotism, where barbers become ministers, and confiscations of large fortunes and oppression of possessors are the order of the day."—Ver. 7. I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth. A contrast to sitting on horseback, which, among the Hebrews was considered a distinction for the upper classes. Comp. 2 Chron. xxv. 28; Esther vi. 8, 9; Jer. xvii. 25; and to this add Justinian xli. 8: "Hoc denique discrimen inter servos liberosque est, quod servi pedibus, liberi non nisi equis incedunt." Here also, as in the preceding verse, the persons compared are to be considered as contrasted not merely in their external condition but also in their character; the princes are really princely, and princely-minded persons, but the servants are men with base servile feeling, which qualifies and makes it right for them to serve.—Vers. 8-10 show that in spite of this sudden elevation, so easily gained by unworthy and foolish persons, their lot is by no means to be envied; because their fortune is rife with dangers, because the intrigues by means of which they excluded their predecessors from their possessions, can easily overthrow them, and because the difficult tasks that devolve on them in their high offices can easily bring upon them injury and disgrace. Wherefore genuine wisdom, of internal worth and business-like capacity, is far preferable to such externally brilliant but unreliable and inconstant fortune of fools. The close connection between these verses and vers. 5-7 is correctly perceived by HITZIG, HENGSTENBERG and HAHN, whilst ELSTER and VAIHINGER isolate their contents too much in wishing to find nothing farther in them than a warning against rebellion, or resistance to divine command.—He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it. This is different from Ps. vii. 15; Prov. xxvi. 27; Sirach xxvii. 26; it is not a pit for others, but simply a pit, the result of severe exertion of a dangerous character, with the implements for digging. Falling into the pit is not presented as a necessary, but only as a very possible case.—And whoso breaketh a hedge, a serpent shall bite him; namely, in accordance with the well-known and frequently confirmed fact, that serpents and other reptiles nest in old walls; comp. Isa. xxxiv. 15; Amos v. 19. The breaking of this hedge appears clearly as an action by which one seeks to injure his neighbor.—Ver. 9. Whoso removeth stones shall be hurt therewith; and he that cleaveth wood shall be endangered thereby. HITZIG, taking the futures יֵעָצֵב and יִסָּכֶן too much in the mere potential sense, says:

"can injure himself." See ver. 8, second clause. For הִסִּיעַ, "to break loose, to tear out," that is stones from the earth (not "to roll away," as KNOBEL says), comp. 1 Kings v. 31.—יִסָּכֶן is not equivalent to "endangereth himself" (Sept., EWALD, KNOBEL and VAIHINGER), but is to be derived from שַׂכִּין a knife (from סכה "to cut;"* comp. Prov. xxiii. 2) and is to be translated in accordance with the vulnerabitur of the Vulgate by, "he will injure or wound himself," (HITZIG, ELSTER, HENGSTENBERG); see LUTHER also.—Ver. 10. If the iron be blunt. (ZÖCKLER translates: "If one has blunted the iron"). Since קֵהָה as piel of קָהָה "to be blunt," can scarcely mean anything else than to make blunt, we must either consider the indefinite "one," as the subject, or the wood-chopper of the previous verse. EWALD ("Authors of the O. T."), HENGSTENBERG and most ancient authors (also the Vulgate and Luther) say, that קֵהָה is to be taken intransitively, and as equivalent to hebescit, retusum fuit, but this is opposed by the following הוּא before לֹא־פָנִים, which clearly shows a change of subject, forbidding the thought that iron can be the subject of this clause. The view formerly entertained by EWALD, "one leaves the iron blunt" (Poetical Books, 1 Ed.), he afterwards discarded as incorrect.—And he do not whet the edge. ZÖCKLER translates: "And it is without edge." HITZIG is correct in saying that לֹא־פָנִים is formed as לֹא בָנִים "childless," 1 Chron. ii. 30, 32, and is equivalent to saying, "without an edge, or edgeless." The subsequent קִלְקַל is not to be connected with these words, but with the following ones, especially as, according to the only passage in which it occurs (Ezek. xxi. 26,) it does not signify to "polish, to sharpen," but "to shake, to swing." (HITZIG and ELSTER are correct, though in opposition to most modern writers, who translate: "And he has not whet the edge"). Then must he put to more strength; i. e., in splitting the wood he must swing† the ax with all his strength.—But wisdom is profitable to direct. ZÖCKLER translates: "But it is a profit wisely to handle wisdom." Read (with HITZIG and ELSTER) הַכְשִׁיר instead of הַכְשֵׁיר thus making the infinitive construct, which, with its object חָכְמָה (as predicate to יִתְרוֹן) forms the subject (i. e., it is a profit, an advantage, or, it is the best; comp. the opposite וְאֵין יִתְרוֹן in ver. 11th. For the phrase הַכְשִׁיר חָכְמָה occurring only here (lit., to make wisdom straight, i. e., to direct it successfully, to handle it skillfully) comp. a similar turn הֵיטִיב חֶסֶד in Ruth iii. 10. It is usual to retain the infinitive absolute הַכְשֵׁיר as a genitive dependent on יִתְרוֹן: "And wisdom is the profit of prosperity" (KNOBEL); or, "wisdom has the advantage of amendment" (HENGSTENBERG); or, "and wisdom is the profit of exertion" (?) EWALD); or, "wisdom gives the advantage of success" (VAIHINGER). But all these renderings give a thought less clear and conformable to the text than ours. LUTHER is not exact: "Therefore wisdom follows diligence," (in harmony with the Vulgate, et post industriam sequetur sapientia). The rendering of HAHN is nearest to ours: "And the favor of wisdom is an advantage," wherein the sense of "favor" for הכשיר does not seem quite appropriate. The entire sense of the verse is essentially correct in the following rendering of HITZIG: Whosoever would proceed securely, and not expose himself to the dangers that are inseparable, even from the application of proper means to ends, toils in vain if he undertakes the task in the wrong way (like those fools in vers. 6–9); the direct, sensible way to the end is the best"—namely, that very humble, modest, but effective way of wisdom, which the author had recommended already in ix. 17, 18; x. 2, 3, and now in vers. 12 ff., farther recommends.

4. Third Strophe. Vers. 11-20.—Of the advantage of the silent, sober, and industrious demeanor of the wise man, over the indolent and loquacious nature of the fool.—Surely the serpent will bite without enchantment. This sentence in close connection with verse 10 advises to a zealous and dexterous application of the remedies at the command of the wise man; but, at the same time, shows the necessity of such application by an example chosen perhaps with reference to verse 8; thus forming the transition to the warning against empty loquacity and its evil consequences contained in vers. 12-14. Koheleth does not here allude to the charming of spiritual serpents, i. e., of vicious men, by importunate requests (HENGSTENBERG) but undoubtedly means the actual art of charming serpents; the possibility of which, or rather the actual existence of which he clearly presupposes in possession of wise and skillful persons, just as the author of the 58th Psalm (vers. 4 and 5), indeed, as Christ himself affirms in Mark xvi. 18; Luke x. 19. (Comp. also Ex. vii. 11, and the learned observations of Knobel on the art of charming serpents among the ancients). בְּלֹא לָחַשׁ literally, "without enchantment," i. e., without that softly murmured magic formula, which, it was pretended, formed the principal agent in expelling poisonous reptiles, if spoken at the proper period, and thus guarded against the danger of being bitten. בַּעַל הַלָּשׁוֹן literally, the "master of the tongue," i. e., who has the poisonous tongue of the reptile in his power, and knows how to extract the poison, or to prevent its biting; or it may also mean the "one with a gifted tongue," who by means of his tongue can produce extraordinary results (HITZIG, HAHN).

*[The meaning given to יִסָּכֵן is probably the correct one (see text note), as derived from the noun שַׂכִּין "a knife" (Arabic سكين); but שכה—סכה, means to see, and is only rendered to cut from its supposed affinity to the Latin seco, and to accommodate it to this word. The sense of סכן "to become poor," as in Isa. xli. 20 (pual), and in the Arabic, might perhaps answer here, but it would mar the parallelism.—T. L.]

The latter interpretation is preferable as much on account of the analogy of בַּעַל כָּנָף Prov. i. 17, and similar expressions, as on account of the context, which clearly shows that the author has in his eye one of ready tongue not making timely use of his gift, a hero with his tongue, but without energy and promptness in action.—Ver. 12. The words of a wise man's mouth are gracious. Such a one therefore should not be silent, as the slack serpent-charmer in ver. 11, but should speak often and much, because he does nothing but good, and acquires favor everywhere with his "gracious" words (LUTHER). חֵן here means id quod gratiam seu favorem parit, or graciousness; comp. Prov. xxxi. 30; and for the sentence in general Prov. xv. 2, 26.—But the lips of a fool will swallow up himself. Comp. Prov. xv. 2; x. 8, 21; xiii. 16, etc. Any other reference of the suffix in the verb תְּבַלְּעֶנּוּ than to the logical subject כְּסִיל is inadmissible. For the plural form שִׂפְתוֹת comp. Isa. lix. 3; Ps. lix. 7.—Ver. 13. The beginning of the words of his mouth are foolishness; and the end of his talk is mischievous madness. That is, there is nothing discreet either in the beginning or the end of his foolish twaddle (HITZIG); he remains a fool in everything that he says; comp. Prov. xxvii. 22. "The end of his talk" is the end which his mouth makes of speaking, the last and most extravagant of his foolish speeches. Of this it is here affirmed that it is mischievous madness, namely, even for himself injurious and mischievous madness; comp. Prov. xviii. 7; Ps. lxiv. 8, etc.—Ver. 14. A fool is also full of words. To the error of his silly speech, he adds that of endless loquacity.* And he is most apt to prattle gladly and much about things of which, from their nature, he can know the least, namely, about future events. And to this fact there is again reference in what is said in the second and third clauses.—A man cannot tell what shall be. מַה־שֶּׁיִּהְיֶה must not be changed into מַה־שֶּׁהָיָה, according to the Septuagint, Symmachus, Vulgate, and Syriac, Vaihinger, etc.; for the subsequent clause does not form a tautology with the present one, even when retaining the Masoretic reading, because there is here denied in the first place only the knowledge concerning the future in itself, and then the actual existence of a foreteller of future events (as a reason for the ignorance of the future).—And what shall be after him who can tell him? As in אַחֲרָיו of chap. vi. 12, (but different from that in וְאַחֲרָיו of chap. ix. 3), the suffix in מֵאַחֲרָיו refers to the subject הָאָדָם, not to מַה־שֶּׁיִּהְיֶה as though there were a distinction here drawn between the near and the remote consequences of the talk of the fool (HITZIG). A restriction of the here mentioned res futuræ to the evil consequences of the thoughtless twaddle of the fool, is quite as

* [יַרְבֶּה דְבָרִים. It is not mere "loquacity" that is here intended. The best explanation is that of Aben Ezra, who refers it to vain predictions, [see note on דְבָרִים, v. 5, Eng. v. 7, p. 91], or rather, boasting assertions in respect to the future: "I will eat and drink, says the fool, but he knows not what shall be in his life or in his death; as is said in another place [v. 7, vi. 12], there are many words that increase vanity, yet who knoweth what is good for man etc." So also RASHI: "In his simpleness, the fool is full of words, deciding confidently and saying, 'to-morrow I will do so and so, when he knoweth not what shall be on the morrow,—or when he would undertake a journey for gain,' and knoweth not that he may fall by the sword." Comp. Luke xii. 20, James iv. 13. This is also the interpretation of MARTIN GEIER, at least in relation to the 14th verse. It is strongly confirmed by the immediately following context.

In such a rendering ו in וסכל, has an adversative force: "Though the fool multiply words, yet man knows not, etc." "For who shall tell him what shall be after him?" This does not mean the remote future, nor even the future generally, as would be expressed by אחריו, but the near, the immediate, which is the sense given by the preposition in the compound מֵאַחֲרָיו, "from after"—that which comes from, out of or directly after the present,—or, "on the morrow," according to the language of these Jewish interpreters, and that of St. James. Comp. FUERST's derivation of מָחָר (to-morrow), which he regards, not as an independent root, but as a contraction of מֵאַחַר, as he makes it, or מֵאַחַר or מַה־אַחַר (see Marg. Note to ver. 7, p. 91). This shows, too, the direct connection with the verse that follows, and furnishes a key to that obscure expression on which there is so much comment to so little purpose. Our English Version: "The labour of the foolish wearieth every one of them, because he knoweth not how to go to the city," is hardly intelligible in any sense that can be put upon it. The same may be said of HITZIG's and ZÖCKLER's attempts to explain it. The expression, עֲמַל הַכְּסִילִים is a collective one, "the toil of fools," equivalent to "a foolish toil," to be taken as a nominative independent, or what DE SACY styles, in his Arabic Grammar, l'inchoatif, or detached subject. Its separation from the verb following is shown by the change of gender,—the feminine prefix in תְּיַגְּעֶנּוּ being used to show that the immediate grammatical subject is the neuter, or indefinite, fact: "Vain toil of fools! it only wearieth him;" the singular objective pronoun in תְּיַגְּעֶנּוּ referring, not to כְּסִילִים taken distributively, but to the vain predicter in ver. 14, and who is kept in view throughout. "It wearieth him,"—is too much for him—surpasses his knowledge. Then אֲשֶׁר gives the reason: "One who knoweth not לָלֶכֶת אֶל עִיר, the going to the city"—so plain a fact as that—or "that he shall go to the city;" even this comes not within his knowledge of the future. "How to go," says our E. V., and that is the idea conveyed by most others; but there is a great difficulty in making any sense out of it, and the grammatical construction does not require it. In the small number of cases in Hebrew where we find ידע followed by the infinitive (whether with or without ל) it is to be determined by the context whether it means a knowing how to do a thing, or a knowledge of the doing, as a fact or event. Thus in Ecclesiastes iv. 13, it cannot mean, "knows not how to be admonished," which makes a very poor sense, but, "no longer knows (that is, heeds or recognizes) admonition," or the being admonished. In Exod. xxxvi. 1, 2 Chron. ii. 13; 1 Kings iii. 7; Isai. vii. 16; Amos iii. 10; the context favors the sense of "knowing how." In Isai. xlvii. it is decidedly the other way: ידע שכול does not mean "know how to be bereaved," but, "know bereavement." Still more clear, and precisely parallel to this case, is Ecclesiastes iv. 17 (Eng. Bib. v. 1) where אינם יודעים לעשות רע can only mean the fact: "They know not that they are doing evil" in their sacrifices. So Ewald renders it. Hitzig and Stuart find there too the sense of knowing how: "They know not how to do evil," or, according to the turn they give it, "how to be sad;" a meaning which we do not hesitate to pronounce absurd in itself, and also altogether unsupported by 2 Sam. xii. 18, to which they refer. According to the view we have taken, the whole passage (vers. 14, 15) may be thus rendered:—

Predicting words he multiplies, yet man can never know
The thing that shall be; yea, what cometh after who shall tell?
Vain toil of fools! it wearieth him,—this man who knoweth not What may befall his going to the city.

It is no paraphrase, but only so expressed as to give the spirit of the Hebrew as shown by the general connection, and by the evident reference of the ידע in ver. 15, to the inadmissible as defining it to consist of his lofty plans and bold projects (HENGSTENBERG). There is simply a general mention of coming events, precisely as in the similar passage in chap. vi. 12.—Ver. 15. The labor of the foolish wearieth every one. Literal, "the labor of fools:" the plural is used distributively just as in verse 1; comp. Hosea iv. 8. The author here passes from the empty and annoying loquacity of the fool to his indolence, his downright inertness, and feeble slothfulness, as to qualities forming a close connection with, and mainly the foundation of, this loquacity.—Because he knoweth not how to go to the city. HITZIG less correctly says: "him who knoweth not," and EWALD "the one who," etc. But this second clause is rather intended to give the reason of the premature fatigue of the fool, as also of the feebleness and unprofitableness of his exertions. "Not to know how to go to the city," is doubtless a proverbial expression allied to that in chap. vi. 8: "to walk before the living," denoting ignorance in respect to behaviour and general incompetency. The way to the city is here mentioned as that which is the best known, most traveled, and easiest to find (VAIHINGER, HENGSTENBERG), not because it leads to those great lords described in ver. 16-19, whom it avails to bribe [EWALD], but simply in so far as the city is the seat of the rulers, of the officers, whence oppression proceeds, and whence also may come relief for the inhabitants of the land (HITZIG, ELSTER). HAHN is peculiar, but hardly in accordance with the true sense of the word אֲשֶׁר: "The travail which foolish rulers (?) prepare for their subjects makes these latter tired and faint, brings them to despair, so that they do not know regarding their going to the city, whether, or when, or how it must take place, in order not to violate a law."—Vers. 16-19 have so loose a connection with ver. 15, that HITZIG seems to be right when he perceives in them the words of the prattling fool previously described (vers. 12-15), instead of the actual speech of the author. The lament about the idle lavishing of time, and luxurious debauchery of a king and his counsellors in these verses, would be then given as an example of the extreme injudiciousness of a foolish man in his talk, and the following warning against such want of foresight (ver. 20) would then be very fittingly annexed. The whole tendency of the section would then seem directed only against thoughtless and idle loquacity, together with its evil consequences; whilst the indolence and luxury of extravagant nobles (vers. 16, 18, 19) form no object of the attack of the author, although he may consider the complaints of the foolish talker as well grounded, and may himself have lived under an authority attended with these vices.* For him who will not accept this view, for which the relation between vers. 5 and 6 of the fourth chapter may be quoted as analogous, there is no other course than, with the great majority of commentators, to see in these verses a farther exten-

לא ידע האדם in ver. 14. The difference between ידע לכת, and ידע ללכת, is very slight, but the ל makes it correspond more nearly to our English genitive phrase, "to know of a thing,"—that is, as an event or fact. The relative אשר here, has an inferential sense, just as ὅς, sometimes, in Greek and the Latin qui when equivalent to quia: "who knoweth not"—to "seeing he knoweth not," or (quod) "because he knoweth not." Such a mention of "going to the city," as one of the most common and familiar illustrations of human ignorance of the future, suggests immediately James iv. 13: "Go to ye who say to-day, or tomorrow, we will go to a certain city, etc., ye who know not (ὅιτινες used exactly as אשר is here) what shall be on the morrow, etc." It may have been this very passage, thus understood, that suggested the illustration to the Apostle; since his language is almost identical with the very words of Rashi's interpretation. The great difficulties under which HITZIG and ZÖCKLER labor, and their far-fetched reasons, warrant the offering of the above explanation, as one that deserves attention, to say the least, in clearing up this obscure passage.

We may arrive at the same general idea, even if we render לא ידע ללכת "knows not how to go, etc.;" and such is substantially the conclusion of ABEN EZRA in another comment on the 15th verse: "The fool is like one who would pry into things too high or too wonderful for him, when he knows not the things that are visible and familiar, or like a man who purposes to go to a city when he knoweth not the way, and so he gets weary, and fails in his design." It is the same general lesson, the folly of confident assertions or confident plans respecting the future. Taken in either of these ways, it avoids the exceedingly forced explanations which ZÖCKLER here, and HITZIG in his commentary, give of the passage.

The expression יֹודֵעַ לַהֲלֹךְ, vi. 8, may, perhaps, be cited as a parallel case to ידע ללכת. An answer might be found in the different form of the infinitive לכת, which is used more like a substantive denoting the event, or fact, as the object of knowledge. This reference, however, is at once disposed of by a consideration of the accents, which, in vi. 8, separate the two words, and require the rendering: "What to the poor man who knows,"—or "what to the intelligent poor man, to walk,"—or "that he should walk before the living." In other words: What profit is his intelligence in his walking before the living? Thus it becomes, according to the usual law of parallelism, an amplification of the thought just above it: "What profit to the wise?" It is another example of the spiritual and critical acuteness that dictated the Masoretic accentuation (see 2d Marginal Note, p. 94). ZÖCKLER thinks the accents here of no authority; but that great critic EWALD holds himself governed by them. The assertion, moreover, that יֹדֵעַ never has the adjective sense intelligens, is refuted by simply looking into a concordance, and noting the places where it is joined with the participle מֵבִין having a like adjective force. With this view agrees also Aben Ezra, the prince of Jewish critics. It is fortified, too, by the difficulty which all commentators have felt in making any clear sense out of the language: "Who knows how to walk before the living?" The references given by Hitzig, Gen. xvii. 1, and 2 Kings iv. 13, are not parallel; since the preposition, on which the meaning of the phrase so much depends, is entirely different.—T. L.]

sion of the theme of indolence, business incapacity and slothfulness of fools, the treatment of which was begun in ver. 15. Ver. 16 would then pass from indolent fools in general to indolent, supine and inefficient rulers and nobles in particular. But there would then exist a very imperfect, if, indeed, any, connection with the final warning in ver. 20; indeed the open manner in which complaints are made, in what immediately precedes, regarding the bad conduct of rulers, would seem to be in direct contradiction to this warning about uttering these complaints loudly. —Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child!—That is, an inexperienced, thoughtless fool, incapable of governing; comp. 1 King's iii. 7: Isa. iii. 4, 12,—which passages also describe it as a great misfortune to be governed by a child [νήπιος]. Therefore נַעַר is not to be rendered by "servant, slave," which latter would rather be expressed by עֶבֶד [contrary to DÖDERLEIN, HERZFELD, et al.).—And thy princes eat in the morning.—A sign of especially excessive intemperance and gluttony; see Isa. v. 11 ff.; Acts ii. 15, and compare also the classical parallels in CICERO, Phil. ii. 40; CATULLUS, Carm. xlvii. 5, 6; JUVENAL, Sat. II. 49, 50.—Ver. 17. Blessed art thou, O land, when thy king is the son of nobles.—(בֶּן־חוֹרִים compare בַּת־נָדִיב Song of Solomon vii. 2; Isa. xxxii. 8); a noble not merely by birth, but also in disposition, vere nobilis, generosus.—And thy princes eat in due season, for strength and not for drunkenness.—Therefore make that proper use of wine treated of in Ps. civ. 15; 1 Tim. v. 23; not that perverted use against which we are warned* in Prov. xxxi. 4. בִּגְבוּרָה is not "in strength" (HAHN), or "in virtue" (EWALD), but "for strength," for obtaining strength. The prep. ב relates to the object on whose account the action occurs, just as in באדם ii. 24 (comp. בם iii. 12). —Ver. 18. By much slothfulness the building decayeth.—That is, the edifice of state, that is here compared to a house that is tottering and threatening to fall (comp. Isa. iii. 6; Amos ix. 11). The intent here is to point out the bad effects of the rioting idleness of the great ones who are called to govern a state. עֲצַלְתַּיִם literally: "the two idle" [hands]; comp. EWALD, § 180 a, 187 c. The expression is stronger than the simple form עַצְלָה or עַצְלוּת (Prov. xix. 15; xxxi. 27); "double idleness," i. e., "great idleness."—And through idleness of the hands the house droppeth through.—That is, the rain penetrating through the leaky roof. The words שִׁפְלוּת יָדַיִם are used as elsewhere רִפְיוֹן־יָדַיִם "idleness of the hands," Isa. xlvii. 3; comp. Prov. x. 4.—Ver. 19. A feast is made for laughter.—A return to the description of riotous and ruinous conduct as given in verse 16. לִשְׂחוֹק "for laughter," as elsewhere בִּשְׂחוֹק with laughter; comp. for this use of לְ 2 Chron. xx. 21; Ps. cii. 5.—עֹשִׂים לֶחֶם literally, "they make bread;" i. e., they give banquets, have riotous feasts. עָשָׂה לֶחֶם is therefore used here in a sense different from that in Ezek. iv. 15, where it signifies "to prepare bread, to bake bread;" comp. עָשָׂה in chap. iii. 12; vi. 12.—And wine maketh merry.—The suffix is wanting just as in עֹשִׂים the הֶם was left out. Comp. moreover, Ps. civ. 15, where an innocent and reasonable enjoyment of wine is meant* whilst here the allusion is to a perverted and debauching use of it, as in chap. vii. 2 ff.—But money answereth all things.—That is, to these luxurious rioters, who, counting on their wealth, declare in drunken arrogance that "money rules the world," "for money one can have every thing that the heart desires, wine, delicacies," etc., etc. For this Epicurean rule of life see HORACE, Epis. I., 6, 36–38. עָנָה literally, "to answer, to listen to" (v. 10), but is here equivalent to "to afford, to grant;" comp. Hosea ii. 23. HITZIG unnecessarily considers יַעֲנֶה as Hiphil ("makes to hear").—Ver. 20. Concerning the probable connection with the preceding, consult vers. 16-19 above.—Curse not the king, no, not in thy thought.—מַדָּע elsewhere "knowledge," here "thought," Sept. συνείδησις. The signification, "study chamber," given by HENGSTENBERG, lacks philological authority. For the sentence comp. 2 Kings vi. 12. HENGSTENBERG is correct in saying: "We have here a pure rule of prudence (not a formal precept of duty), a tenet that may be simply summed up in the expression of the Lord: γίνεσθε φρόνιμοι ὡς οἱ ὄφεις."—And curse not the rich in thy bed chamber.—The rich here represents the noble, the prince, or the counsellor of the king (comp. v. 16).—For a bird of the air shall carry the voice.—That is, in an inconceivable manner, which no one would consider possible, will that he betrayed which thou hast said. See the proverb: "The walls have ears;" also Hab. ii. 11; Luke xix. 14.—And that which hath wings shall tell the matter.—בַּעַל הַכְּנָפַיִם equivalent to בַּעַל־כָּנָף Prov. i. 17. The K'ri would unnecessarily here strike out the article before כְּנָפַיִם.

*[In Ps. civ. 15 a certain effect of wine is mentioned; nothing is said about either its innocent or its immoral use. All such remarks are gratuitous.—T. L.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

(With Homiletical Hints)

Although the conclusion of the chapter—the warning against injudicious speeches assailing the respect due to kings in ver. 20—may have been written with conscious reference to the relation of Israel to its Persian rulers, the section, taken as a whole, is simply an unambiguous illustration of the relation between wise men and fools. The allegorical conception of HENGSTENBERG, by virtue of which he sees in chap. x. 1-3 the idea that the people of God, groaning under the tyranny of the world, will be sustained by reference to the fact that the hostile world, i. e., the Persian world, is given over to folly, and that thus its destruction cannot be far off,—this conception, we say, finds no sufficient support in the text; it is, rather, very decidedly opposed by the exceeding general character of the morally descriptive as well as of the admonitory parts. The contents and the tendency of the section form an eloquent, figurative, vivid and popular illustration of the superiority of wisdom over folly. The theme here treated is that favorite one of the Proverbs—the parallels between wisdom and folly [Prov. i. 20 ff.; ix. 1 ff.; x. 1 ff.; xiv. 1 ff.; xxiv. 1 ff.]; and simply with the difference that here are more emphatically and accurately described the insolence and haughtiness of fools, as well as their loquacity and indolent levity, in contrast to the corresponding virtues of the wise. See exegetical illustrations above, No. 1. A Homily on the entire Chapter: Of a few dominant qualities and principal characteristics of wisdom and folly.—Or, of genuine wisdom as the only remedy against the vices of pride, levity and arrogance, together with their evil consequences.—Comp. STARKE: Three moral precepts: 1. Esteem genuine wisdom (vers. 1-15). 2. Avoid indolence and debauchery (vers. 16-19). 3. Curse not the king (ver. 20).

HOMILETICAL HINTS ON SEPARATE PASSAGES.

Ch. ix. 17; x. 4. MELANCHTHON (ix. 17): The words of the wise are heard by the silent—that is, by those who are not carried away by raging lusts, but who seek for things true and salutary. (Ver. 10). Good counsels, sound teaching, well ordered methods, are constantly marred and rendered unavailing by trifling meddlers, who are more readily heard, both in courts and by the people, than the more modest and poor, who give right instruction and salutary advice. LANGE (ix. 18). He who has learned any thing thoroughly can effect much good thereby, but also much evil, if he wickedly uses what he has learned against the great purposes of God. CARTWRIGHT:—Such patient submission calms the most violent tempests of the soul; it makes tranquil the most swollen waves of passion; it turns the lion into a lamb. Let us strive then to be imbued with this virtue by which we may please God as well as men, even those who are the farthest removed from piety and humanity. STARKE (ver. 3):—It is difficult to expel folly and instil wisdom; but it becomes still more difficult when man in his folly considers himself wise (Rom. i. 22).—(Ver. 4). To suffer and patiently commend one's innocence to God is the best remedy against misused power and the wrong that we have endured, Jer. xi. 20.

GEIER (ver. 5):—Lofty positions and great power have not the privilege of infallibility. Therefore, the higher one stands, the more careful let him be, entreating God that he may not fall into error and vice.—HANSEN (vers. 6 and 7):—The want of foresight in rulers ever exerts evil influences in the world. The unworthy are thereby preferred to the worthy, and every thing takes a wrong course.—(Ver. 10):—It depends more on wisdom and foresight than on physical strength, to carry on the occupations of men with success.—HENGSTENBERG (ver. 9): He who proceeds with violence in the moral sphere, and thus performs actions that, in respect to this quality, are similar to the breaking of stone or the splitting of wood, will suffer inevitable injury.—(Ver. 10). He who in wisdom possesses the corrective whereby he can sharpen the blunt iron of his understanding, must rise, however deep he may be sunken. He who does not possess it must go to ruin, however high he may have risen.

Vers. 11-15. BRENZ:—There is nothing in man which contributes more to bring him into sin than his tongue. Truth is satisfied with the fewest and simplest words, and the wiser the man, or the more attached to truth, the more sparing is he in his speech. (Ver. 15). This teaches that no labor, no diligence, will produce fruit, if one knows not the legitimate use of labor. As the unskilled steward has much toil, with little or no result, if he knows not how to put to use the goods acquired in the proper manner, or does not carry them to market in the city.—CRAMER:—The unprofitable babblers prattle about things of no import; but the wise weigh their words with a golden balance, Sirach xxi. 27.—STARKE:—Ver. 15. That men must painfully toil is a thing of universal necessity since the fall; but to toil in profitless and sinful things is double folly and sin, Isaiah lvii. 10.—ZEYSS [ver. 15]:—Remember the city of the living God (Heb. xii. 22) and learn the right way thither, which is indeed narrow and not easy to find (Luke xiii. 24).—GEIER (ver. 16):—In judging a wise man we are not to regard his years, but the power of his mind, and what they manifest, 1 Sam. xvi. 17; 1 Tim. iv. 12.—[Ver. 17]. A pious and virtuous magistracy we should gratefully recognize as an inestimable gift of God, and heartily pray to him for their preservation.—ZEYSS (vers. 18, 19):—Beware, above all things, that the house of thy soul be not ruined by neglect, whilst thou art yielding to the flesh and its sinful desires.—TUB. BIB.:—Observe this rule of wisdom: speak no evil of thy ruler, nor of any one else, James iv. 11.—[MATTHEW HENRY] (ver. 14):—A fool also is fond of words, a passionate fool especially, that runs on endlessly, and never knows when to take up; it is all the same, over and over; he will have the last word, though it be but the same with that which was the first. What is wanting in the strength of his words he endeavors in vain to make up in their number. The words that follow may be taken either (1) as checking him for his vain-glorious boasting in the multitude of his words (in respect to the future), namely, what he will do, and what he will have, not considering what every body knows, that a man cannot tell what shall be in his own time while he lives (Prov. xxvii. 1), much less can one tell what shall be after him, when he is dead and gone. Or (2) as mocking him for his tauto-logies; he is full of words, for if he do but speak the most trite and common thing, such as a man cannot tell what shall be, then, because he loves to hear himself talk, he will say it over again, what shall be after him, who can tell him? like BATTUS in Ovid:

Sub illis
Montibus (inquit) erant, et erant sub montibus illis.

Whence vain repetitions are called Battologies (Matth. vi. 7).—[Ver. 15. The foolish tire themselves in endless pursuits, because they know not how to go to the city, because they have not capacity to apprehend the plainest thing, such as the entrance to a great city. But it is the excellency of the way to the heavenly city, that it is "a highway" in which "the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err" (Isaiah xxxv. 8); yet sinful folly makes men miss that way.—T. L.]

C. The only true way to happiness in this world and the world beyond consists in benevolence, fidelity to calling, a calm and contented enjoyment of life, and unfeigned fear of God from early youth to advanced age.

CHAP. XI. 1—XII. 7.

1. Of Benevolence and Fidelity to Calling.

(CHAP. XI. 1-6.)

1 Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days.
2 Give a portion to seven, and also to eight, for thou knowest not what evil shall be
3 upon the earth. If the clouds be full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth, and if the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the 4 tree falleth, there it shall be. He that observeth the wind shall not sow, and he
5 that regardeth the clouds shall not reap. As thou knowest not what is the way of the spirit, nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child: even 6 so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all. In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand; for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good.

2. Of a Calm and Contented Enjoyment of Life.

(VERS. 7-10.)

7 Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun:
8 But if a man live many years, and rejoice in them all; yet let him remember the days
9 of darkness, for they shall be many. All that cometh is vanity. Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou, that for 10 all these things God will bring thee into judgment. Therefore remove sorrow from thy heart, and put away evil from thy flesh: for childhood and youth are vanity.

3. Of the Duty of the Fear of God for Young and Old.

(CHAP. XII. 1-7.)

1 Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in 2 them; While the sun, or the light, or the moon, or the stars, be not darkened, nor 3 the clouds return after the rain: In the day when the keepers of the house shall tremble, and the strong men shall bow themselves, and the grinders cease because

[Ch. xi. Ver. 3.—יְהוּא. If it is allowable at all to vary from the text that has come down to us, this may be regarded as equivalent to שָׁם הוּא (comp. i. 5) "there is he," there it is. It might easily arise in writing from the ear, the shewa sound being hardly perceptible. If we regard it as the future of the substantive verb הָיָה, or הוה, with א for ה, it is not a Syriasm, since the future of the Syriac verb would be יֶהֱוֵא or rather נֶהֱוֵא.—T. L.]

Its frequency or rarity would be like that of the word quake, in English as compared with tremble. EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The close connection of verses 1-7 of the 12th chapter with chap. 11 is correctly recognized by most modern commentators; a few, as HITZIG and ELSTER, unnecessarily add to it also chap. xii. 8. A section thus extended beyond the limits of the 11th chapter concentrates within itself, as the closing division of the fourth and last discourse, all the fundamental thoughts of the book, and in such a manner that it almost entirely excludes the negative and skeptical elements of earlier discussions and observations [only that the words כָּל־הֶבֶל return again in chap. xi. 8; comp. xi. 10], and therefore lets its recapitulation very clearly appear as a victory of the positive side of its religious view over the gloomy spectre of doubt, and the struggles of unbelief (comp. Int. § 1, Obs. 2). The entire section may be clearly divided into three subdivisions or strophes, the first of which teaches the correct use of life as regards actions and labor, the second concerns enjoyment, and the third the reverence and fear of God, with an admonition to these respective virtues.

2. First Strophe, first half. Chap. xi. 1-3. An admonition to benevolence, with reference to its influence on the happiness of him who practices it. HITZIG, instead of finding here an admonition to beneficence, sees a warning against it, an intimation that we hope too much for the good, and arm ourselves too little against future evil; but every thing is opposed to this, especially the words and sense of ver. 3, which see.—Cast thy bread upon the waters.—That is, not absolutely cast it away (HITZIG), nor send it away in ships (as merchandise) over the water (HENGSTENBERG), but "give it away in uncertainty, without hope of profit or immediate return." The admonition is in the same spirit as that in Luke xvi. 9; Prov. xi. 24 f. The Greek aphoristic poets have the expression "to sow on the water;" as THEOG., Sent. 105. *Phocyllides, 142 c.

The entire sentence (most probably as derived from this source) is found in BEN SIRA (BUXTORF, Florileg. Heb., page 171), and among the Arabians as a proverb: Benefac, projice panem tuum in aquam; aliquando tibi retribuetur (DIEZ, Souvenirs of Asia, II., 106).—For thou shalt find it after many days.—תִּמְצָאֶנּוּ is here clearly used in the sense of finding again.—בְּרֹב הַיָּמִים literally, "in the fullness of days, within many days." Comp. Ps. v. 6; lxxii. 7, etc. The sense is without doubt this: Among the many days of thy life there will certainly come a time when the seeds of thy good deeds scattered broadcast will ripen into a blessed harvest. Comp. Gal. vi. 9; 2 Cor. ix. 6-9; 1 Tim. vi. 18, 19; also Prov. xix. 17: "He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord."—Ver. 2. Give a portion to seven and also to eight.—That is, divide thy bread with many; for "seven and eight" are often used in this sense of undetermined plurality, as in Micah v. 4; comp. also "three and four," Prov. xxx. 15 ff.; Amos i. 3; ii. 1 ff.—HITZIG runs entirely counter to the text, and does violence to the usual signification of חֵלֶק in saying: "make seven pieces of one piece, divide it so that seven or eight pieces may spring from it," which admonition would simply be a rule of prudence (like the maxim followed by Jacob, Gen. xxxii. 8) not to load all his treasures on one ship, that he might not be robbed of every thing at one blow. This thought comports neither with the context nor with ver. 6, where the sense is entirely different.—For thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth.—That is, what periods of misfortune may occur when thou wilt pressingly need strength by community with others; comp. Luke xvi. 9.—Ver. 3. If the clouds be full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth.—Not that evil or misfortune "occurs from stern necessity, or in immutable course" [HITZIG, and also HENGSTENBERG, who here sees announced the near and irrevocable doom of the Persian monarchy], but exactly the reverse: let the good that thou doest proceed from the strongest impulse of sympathy, so that it occurs, as from a natural necessity, that rich streams of blessings flow forth from thee; comp. John vii. 38; also Prov. xxv. 14; Sirach xxxv. 24; also the Arabian proverbs in the grammar of ERPENIUS, ed. Schultens, p. 424. Pluvia nubis co-operiens, dum dona funderet, etc.—And if the tree fall toward the south or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth there it shall be.—This is apparently a parallel in sense to the second clause of ver. 2, and therefore refers to the irrevocable character of the doom, or the Divine decree that overtakes man [HITZIG, HENGSTENBERG, etc.; also HAHN, who, however, translates the last clause thus: "One may be at the place where the tree falls," and consequently be killed by it]. But it seems more in accordance with the text, and with the introduction [not with כִּי but with the simple copula וְ] to find the same sense expressed in this second clause as in the first, and consequently thus: "the utility of the tree remains the same, whether it falls on the ground of a possessor bordering it to the north or the south; if it does not profit the one, it does the other. And it is just so with the gifts of love; their fruit is not lost, although they do not always come to light in the manner intended" (ELSTER; comp. also VAIHINGER and WOHLFARTH, etc.). GEIER and ROSENMUELLER are quite peculiar in the thought that the falling tree is the rich man, who is here warned of his death, after which he can do no more good deeds (similar to this are the views of SEB. SCHMIDT, STARKE, MICHAELIS, etc.). יְהוּא a secondary Aramaic* form of יִהְיֶה and therefore literally equivalent to: "it will be, it will lie there;" for which consult EWALD, § 192 c, as well as HITZIG on this passage. There is no grammatical foundation for the assertion that it is a substantive to be derived from an obsolete verb הוא and explained by the word "break" [שָׁם יְהוּא "there occurs the break or fracture of the tree," as says STARKE].

3. First strophe, second half. Vers. 4-6. An admonition to zealous, careful, and untiring performance in one's calling [μὴ ἐκκακεῖν, "not to faint," as before he was warned ποιεῖν τὸ καλὸν, to be earnest in well doing, Gal. vi. 9]. He that observeth the wind shall not sow.—A warning against timid hesitancy and its laming influence on effective and fruitful exertion. He whom the weather does not suit, and who is ever waiting for a more favorable season, misses finally the proper period for action. The second clause expresses the same admonitory thought regarding excessive considerateness.—Ver. 5. As thou knowest not what is the way of the spirit, nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her who is with child.—[ZÖCKLER renders "way of the wind." See the excursus appended, p. 150.—T. L.]—That is, as thou canst not comprehend nor see through the mysteries of nature. That the origin and pathway of the winds is in this regard proverbial, is shown by John iii. 8 [comp. above, chap. i. 6]. For the formation of the bones in the womb of the mother as a process peculiarly mysterious and unexplainable, comp. Ps. cxxxix. 13-18.—Even so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all.—The "works" or action of God are, of course, His future dealing,* which is a mystery absolutely unknown and unfathomable by men; wherefore all success of human effort can neither be known nor calculated in advance. "Who maketh all;" for this comp. Amos iii. 6; Matth. x. 28, 29, Eph. iii. 20, etc.

[THE UNKNOWN WAY OF THE SPIRIT AND OF LIFE.—ECCLESIASTES xi. 5.—"As thou knowest not the way of the Spirit, nor how the bones do grow," etc. The words דֶּרֶךְ הָרוּחַ are rendered here by ZÖCKLER, STUART, and HITZIG, "the way of the wind." There would be good reason for this from the verse preceding; but what follows points to the sense of spirit, although the word was undoubtedly suggested by what was said in ver. 4 of the wind. The best way, however, is to regard the double idea of wind and spirit as being intended here, as in our Saviour's language, John iii. 8. About the words following there can be no mistake. The process described is set forth as the peculiar work of God, a Divine secret which human knowledge is challenged ever to discover. "Thou knowest not the way of the spirit" [רוּחִי Gen. vi. 3, "my spirit," that I have given to man], "nor how the bones do grow," that is, how that spirit, or life, reorganizes itself each time, clothes itself anew in the human system, making the bones to grow according to their law, and building up for itself a new earthly house in every generic transmission. This is the grand secret, the knowledge and process of which God challenges to Himself. Science can do much, but it can never discover this. We may say it boldly, even as Koheleth makes his affirmation, science never will discover this; for it lies above the plane of the natural; and in every case, though connected with nature, demands a plus power, or some intervention, however regulated by its own laws, of the supernatural. The Bible thus presents it as God's challenged work [comp. Gen. ii. 7; vi. 3; Job xxxiii. 14; Ps. cxxxix. 13; Jerem. i. 5], the same now as in the beginning when the Word of life first went forth, and nature received a new life power, or, rather, a rising in the old. The passage of life from an old organism to a new is as much a mystery as ever. We mean the transition from the last enclosing matter of the former, through the moment of disembodiment, or material unclothing (see note, Gen., p. 170), when it takes that last matter of the previous organization, or of the seed vessel, or seed fluid, and immediately makes it the commencing food, the first material it uses in building up the new house in which it is to dwell. In respect, too, to the mystery of supernatural origin, it is as much a new creation as though that unclothed and immaterial power of life [whether in the vegetable or in the animal sphere] had for the first time begun its manifestation in the universe. It is the same Word, sounding on in nature, or, as the Psalmist says, "running very swiftly,"—πνεῦμα νοερὸν, εὐκίνητον, ἐνεργετικὸν, παντοδύναμον, πάσης κινήσεως κινητικώτερον, καὶ διὰ πάντων διήκον, διὰ τὴν καθαρότητα; Wisd. of Sol. vii. 23, 24. It is the transmission, not merely of an immaterial power (though even as a power science can only talk about it or find names for its phenomena), but also of a law and an idea (νοερὸν as well as ἐνεργετικὸν, an intelligent working we may say) representing, in this dimensionless monad force the new life exactly as it represented the old in all its variety, whether of form or of dynamical existence,—in other words, transmitting the species, or the specific life, as that which lives on, and lives through, and lives beyond, all the material changes that chemistry has discovered or can ever hope to discover. Science may show how this life is affected in its manifestations by the outward influences with which it comes in contact, the changes that may seem to enter even the generic sphere, and it may thus rightly require us to modify our outward views in respect to the number and variety of strictly fundamental forms; but the transmission itself of the species (however it may have arisen or been modified) into the same form again of specific life, or the carrying a power, a law, and an idea, in a way that neither chemical nor mechanical science can ever trace,—this is the Divine secret towards which the Darwinian philosophy has not made even an approach. Its advocates know no more about it than did the old philosophers who held a theory precisely the same in substance, though different in its technology. They talked of atoms as men now talk of fluids, forces, and nebular matter; but give them time enough, or rather give them the three infinities of time, space, and numerical quantity of conceivable forms, and they would show us how from infinite incongruities falling at last into congruity and seeming order, worlds and systems would arise, though their form, their order, and the seeming permanence arising from such seeming order, would be only names of the states that were; any other states that might have arisen being, in such case, equally entitled to the same appellations. Like the modern systems, it was all idealess, without any intervention of intelligence either in the beginning or at any stages in the process. It is astonishing how much, in the talk about the Darwinian hypothesis, these two things have been confounded,—the possible outward changes in generic forms, and the inscrutable transmission of the generic life in the present species, or in the present individual. The theory referred to is adapted only to an infinity of individual things, ever changing outwardly, and which, at last, fall into variety of species through an infinite number of trials and selections, or of fortunate hits after infinite failures. It makes no provision, however, for one single case of the transmission of the same specific life, either in the vegetable or the animal world. There it has to confess its ignorance, though it treats it sometimes as a very slight ignorance, soon to be removed. How pigeons, taken as an immense number of individual things, undergo an eternal series of outward changes,—how existing pigeons spread into varieties, by some being more lucky in their selections than others—all this it assumes to tell us. But in the presence of the great every day mystery, the wonderful process that is going on in the individual pigeon's egg, invisibly, yet most exactly, typing the pigeon life that now is, it stands utterly speechless. One of its advocates seems to regard this as a very small matter, at present, indeed, not fully understood as it will be, but of little consequence in its bearing on the great scheme. It has its laws undoubtedly, but the principle of life, he maintains, is chemical,—that is, it is a certain arrangement of matter. Now this we cannot conceive, much less know. We are equally baffled whether we take into view the grosser (as they appear to the sense) or the more ethereal kinds of matter, whether as arranged in greater magnitudes, or in the most microscopic disposition of atoms, molecules, or elementary gases constituted by them. We may attempt still farther to etherealize by talking of forces, motions [motions of what?] heat, magnetism, electricity, etc. They are still but quantities, matters of more or less. And so the modern chief of the positive school has boldly said: all is quantity, all is number; life is quantity, thought is quantity (so much motion); what we call virtue is quantity; it can be measured. And so all knowledge is ultimately mathematics, or the science of quantity. There is nothing that cannot be reduced, in its last stages, to a numerical estimate. There is, moreover, just so much matter, force, and motion in the universe,—ever has been, ever will be. And there is nothing else. But how life, a thing in itself dimensionless, to say nothing of feeling, thought, and consciousness, can come out of such estimates is no more conceivable of one kind of matter, however moving, than it is of another. Still more do we fail to imagine how it can, in any way, be the result of figure, arrangement, position, quantity, or of σχῆμα, τάξις, θέσις, as LEUCIPPUS and DEMOCRITUS called their three prime originating causalities [see ARISTOT., Met. II. 4]. But so it is, they still continue to insist, though chemistry has searched long and could never find it, or even "the way to its house," as is said, Job xxxvii. 20, of the light. Prof. HAECKEL, of Jena, in his Natürliche Schöpfungsgeschichte, maintains "that all organized beings are potentially present in the first matter of the nebular system." He looks upon "all the phenomena of life as a natural sequence of their chemical combination, as much as if they were conditions of existence, though the ultimate causes are hidden from us." There may be some truth in what is said about conditions [for conditions are not causes], but it is the other remark that demands attention: "though the ultimate causes may be hidden from us." He seems to regard this as a very slight circumstance, which ought to have little effect on the great argument of what calls itself the exact and "positive philosophy." There is yet indeed an unimportant break in the chain; a link or two is to be supplied; that is all, they would say. But what data have we for determining what is lacking before the full circuit of knowledge is completed? A most important inquiry this: how great is the separation made by the unknown?

Is it a few inches, or a space greater than the stellar distances? Is it a thin partition through which the light is already gleaming, or is it a vast ...m, compared with which any difference be- ... the most ancient and the most modern ...dge is as nothing? Is it something that ...assed over in time, or is it the measure- of infinity which the Eternal and Infi- ...lone can span? "They are yet hid- ..." he says. Is there the least ray of ...st advanced science that shows us ... approaching this mysterious re- ...? Is there any reason to think ...ticle more about it than ARIS- ... ancient positivists who talked ...nd θέσις, or any of those profound ...old whose better reasoned atheism ... has so fully refuted in his great ... And yet this professor of "exact sci- ... talks of his monera, the prototypes of the ...otista, and how from these came neutral monera, and from these, again, vegetable and animal monera, just as freely as though he knew all about it from his inch of space and moment of time, or had not just admitted an ignorance which puts him at an inconceivable distance from that which he so confidently claims to explain. For it should be borne in mind that science has not merely failed to discover the principle of life, as "positive knowledge;" she cannot even conceive it: she cannot form a theory of it which does not run immediately into the old mechanical and chemical language of number and quantity, out of which she cannot think, nor talk, without bringing in the supernatural, and that, too, as something above her province. After what is told us about the monera, etc., the writer proceeds to say: "this once established, from each of the archetypes, we have a genealogy developed which gives us the history of the protozoan and animal kingdoms," etc., as though any thing had been established, and he had not admitted his ignorance of a prime truth without which he cannot take a step in the direction in which he so blindly hastes. There is nothing new in this, in substance, though there may be much that is novel in form and technology. It is the old philosophy of darkness. It is as true of this modern school as it was of the old cosmologists of whom ARISTOTLE first said it, ἐκ νυκτὸς πάντα γεννᾷν, "that they generate all things out of Night." This bringing every thing out of the nebular chaos through mechanical action and chemical affinities, and these grounded on nothing else than σχῆμα, τάξις, and θέσις, is nothing more than the Hesiodean generations, or the Love and Discord, the attractions and repulsions, of EMPEDOCLES. It is the pantogony of these old world builders, but without their splendid poetry.

"All organized beings in the first nebular matter," and that from eternity! Then, of course, there has been no addition in time, no plus quantity, or plus power, or any plus idea combined with power; for that would be something which previously was not. NEWTON was in the toad-stool; for what is not in cannot come out, or be developed; and so every toad-stool now contains a NEWTON; every fungus contains an academy of science, or a school of "positive philosophy." The carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, oxygen, or still earlier and more formless matter out of which this thinking arises, is there, only in a different τάξις and θέσις, perhaps. There has been no more addition to nature in the physical development of the rationalist commentator than in that of the כִּנִּם (Exod. viii. 17; Ps. cv. 31) or Egyptian lice, whose immediate production he regards as beneath the dignity of any supposed Divine or supernatural action. And so there can be no real or essential difference in rank. The kinnim were as much in the first matter as the phosphorus that thinks in the brain of the theologian; they had as high and as old a place. The idea, too, of the kinnim was there, and all the machinery of their development; so that there was no saving of means or labor; their immediate genesis would cost no more, or be any more of a belittling work, than their mediate, or developed production. These insignificant creatures were provided for from all eternity. But providing means foreseeing, foreknowing; and language revolts. We cannot consistently talk atheism or materialism in any human dialect; God be thanked for such a provision in the origin and growth of speech. We can, indeed, say in words, as one of the boldest of this godless school has said, ohne Phosphor kein Gedanke, "without phosphorus no thought;" but then we must give up the word idea as, in any sense a cause originating; for there could be no idea antecedent to the phosphoric matter, or that order and position of it, out of which idea, or the development of thought, was to arise; that is, any idea of phosphorus before phosphorus. There is, then, nothing eternal, immutable, undeveloped, or having its being in itself, and to which, as an ideal standard, the terms higher and lower can be referred to give them any meaning. For all risings of matter, or form, to higher forms regarded as any thing else than simply unfoldings of previous matter, or previous arrangements of forces, are creations as much as any thing that is supposed first to commence its being as a whole; since more from less involves the maxim de nihilo, as well as something from nothing in its totality. If they were in that previous matter without a new commandment, a new word, and a plus activity accompanying it, then they are not truly a rising. They are no more, in quantity, than what they were; and quantity is all. Quality, according to COMTE, is but a seeming; it is not a positive entity, but only σχῆμα, τάξις, and θέσις, an arrangement of matter. The potentiality, then, has all that there is, or can be, in any actuality. Even that inconceivable power which causes any potentiality to be thus potential, is, itself, only a potentiality included in the infinite sum of potentiality, which, as a whole, is also, in some way, caused to be what it is, and as it is. We say, in some way; for to say for some reason, would, at once, be bringing in a new word, and a new idea, utterly foreign to this whole inconceivable scheme. According to the other philosophy, Reason is "in the beginning," ἐν ἀρχῇ ἦν ὁ Λόγος (John i.; Prov. viii. 22). But here reason is junior to matter, something developed, and which could, therefore, neither as intelligens nor as intellectum, be made a ground of that from which itself proceeds. We can never get out of this labyrinth; for the moment we bring in a plus quantity, or a plus activity, or a plus idea, or any thing seeming to be such, we only have a new causative potentiality, and that demanding another, which is potential of it, and so on ad infinitum; the infinity, too, not proceeding from the highest downward, but from the lowest state [or that which is next to nothing], as being the first possible manifestation of being in the universe of conceivable things. Again, it may be asked, why has not this infinite potentiality, in this infinite time, developed all things potential, so that pigeons should long since have become arch-angels, and our poor, earthly, dying race long since risen "to be as gods." Or how, if we shrink from that, are we to avoid the converse conclusion, that the whole state of things now actual, now developed, is still infinitely low, and that the highest and best in the sphere of soul, and thought, and reason, is not only as yet undeveloped, but infinitely far in condition, and eternally far in time, from its true actuality,—if, in such a scheme, highest and best have any real meaning. It makes the lowest and most imperfect first, the best and perfect last, or at such an infinite distance that it may be said they never come. Religion and the Scriptures just reverse this. They put soul first, mind first, the Personal first, the all Holy, the all Wise, the all Righteous, the all Perfect, first, whilst every seeming imperfection contributes to the manifestation of the infinite excellency and infinite glory of the one separate personal God who is first of all and over all.

How poor the science of Koheleth, it may be said, and yet he has propounded here a problem having regard to one of the most common events of life, but which the ages are challenged to solve: "As thou knowest not the way of the spirit, or even how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child, even so thou knowest not the work of God who worketh all,"—אֶת־הַכֹּל the all, the great paradigm which He is bringing out in space and time [ch. iii. 14], and for those moral and spiritual ends to which the natural, with all its changes, and all its developments, is at every moment subservient In one sense, indeed, it has no plus quantities. All is provided for in Him "who is the A and the Ω, the First and the Last, the ἀρχὴ καὶ τέλος, the Beginning and the End." "All that God doeth is for the olam, the Great Eternity" [iii. 14]. "Nothing can be added to it or taken from it;" but this, instead of excluding the supernatural, or shutting all things up in nature, necessitates the idea that there is a world above nature, a power, or rather an Eternal "Word [ἐν ᾧ τὰ πάντα συνέστηκε (Col. i. 17)] in whom all things consist," or stand together. This Word still speaks in nature. There, still abides its constant voice, קוֹל דְּמָמָה דַקָּה [1 Kings xix. 12], susurrus auræ tenuis, its "thin still voice," that is heard "after the fire and the wind," its שֵׁמֶץ דָּבָר, its "whisper word," as Job calls it, xxvi. 14; and then again there is the "going forth" of its "mighty thunder voice," רַעַם גְּבוּרֹתָיו which "none but God can understand," speaking in its great periodic or creative utterances, as it did of old, and as it shall speak again, when it calls for the "new heavens and the new earth," giving to nature its new movement and its still holier Sabbath. It is this greater utterance that brings into the natural development its plus powers and plus ideas, not from any undeveloped physical necessity, but from a Divine fullness, not arbitrarily, but from its own everlasting higher law.

Throughout all the seeming nature there remains this mysterious, generative, life-giving process in the vegetable, the animal, and especially in the human birth, as a constant symbol of the supernatural presence, or of the old unspent creative force, still having its witness in continually recurring acts, ever testifying to the great Divine secret that baffles science, and to the explanation of which she cannot even make an approach.

There is an allusion to this mystery of generation, Ps. cxxxix. 13: "Thou didst possess my reins [claim them as thine own curious work], thou didst overshadow me in my mother's womb." So also in ver. 15: "My substance was not hid from thee,"—עָצְמִי my bone, the same symbolic word that is here employed by Koheleth. In fact, it was ever so regarded by the earliest mind, as it must be by the latest and most scientific. Koheleth simply expressed the proverbial mystery of his day. It existed in the thinking and language of the most ancient Arabians; as is evident from the use Mohammed makes of it in the Koran. His mode of speaking of it shows that it was a very old query that had long occupied the thoughts of men. Hence his adversaries are represented as proposing it to him as a test of his being a true prophet (see Koran Sur. XVII. 78): "They will ask thee about the spirit (عن الروح); say: the spirit is according to the command of my Lord, and ye have been gifted with knowledge but a very little way." When he says "the spirit is by the command of my Lord," he has reference to a distinction that was made (and very anciently it would seem) between the creation of spirit, and that of matter, or nature strictly. The latter was through media, steps, or growth, whilst spirit was immediate, by the command of God, according to the language of Ps. xxxiii. 9, or the frequent expression in the Koran which so closely resembles it, كُنْ فكان, "be, and it was." AL ZAMAKHSHARI, in his Commentary, p. 783, 2, tells us that the Jews bid the Koreish ask Mohammed three questions—one about the mystery of "the cave and the sleepers," one about Dhu l' Karnein, and the third, this question about the spirit. If he pretended to answer them all, or if he answered neither of them, then he was no true prophet. He answered the first two, but confessed his ignorance of the human soul, as being something "the knowledge of which God had reserved to Himself." Then he told them that there was the same reserve in their law (the Old Testament) which revealed to them nothing about the way of the spirit, דרך הרוח. If Mohammed knew any thing about the Bible (and there is but little reason in the contrary supposition), then it may be reasonably thought that in what is thus said of him by the Koranic commentator, he had reference to such passages as this of Ecclesiastes (compare also Eccles. iii. 21, מִי יֹדֵעַ רוּחַ, "who knoweth the spirit," etc.), or to the general reserve of the Old Testament respecting the soul, or in a more special manner to Gen. ii. 7; vi. 3, where there are ascribed to God the more direct creation of, and a continued property in, the human spirit. This would seem, too, from Ps. civ. 29, to be asserted, in some sense, even of the animal creation.—T. L.]

Ver. 6. In the morning sow thy seed.—The sowing of seed is here a figurative designation of every regular vocation or occupation, not specially of benevolence; comp. Job iv. 8; Ps. cxxvi. 5; 1 Cor. ix. 10, 11.—And in the evening withhold not thine hand.—Literal, "towards evening" (לָעֶרֶב), i. e., be diligent in thy business from the early morning till the late evening, be incessantly active.—For thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that.—אֵי זֶה, not "what," but "whether;" the expression refers, as it seems, to the double labor, that of the morning and that of the evening. "We are to arrange labor with labor, because the chances are equal, and we may therefore hope that if one fails, the other may succeed. God may possibly destroy one work—and who knows which? (comp. chap. v. 6); it is well if thou then hast a support, a second arrow to send" (HITZIG).—Or whether they shall both be alike good—i. e., whether both kinds of labor produce what is really good, substantial and enduring, or whether the fruit of the one does not soon decay, so that only the result of the other remains. כְּאֶחָד "together," as in Ezra vi. 20; 2 Chron. v. 13; Isa. lxv. 25.

4. Second strophe. Vers. 7-10. Admonition to calmness and content, ever mindful of divine judgment, and consequently to the cheerful enjoyment of the blessings of this life.—Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun. HITZIG correctly gives the connection with the preceding: The tendency of the advice in vers. 1-6 (mainly in ver. 6) to secure guaranties in life, is justified in ver. 7. "Life is beautiful and worthy of receiving care." ELSTER is less clear and concise: "Such an energy of mental activity (as that demanded in vers. 1-6) will only be found where there is no anxious calculation about the result; but where man finds alone in the increased activity of his mental powers, (?) and in the intense striving after an eternal goal, his satisfaction and reward," etc. The "light" here stands for life, of which it is the symbol. (Comp. Ps. xxxvi. 9; xlix. 19; lvi. 13; Job iii. 20). And so the expression: "to behold the sun," for which see not only Ps. lviii. 9; John xi. 9, but also passages in classic authors, e. g., EURIPIDES, IPHIG. in Aul. 1218: ἡδὺ γὰρ τὸ φῶς βλέπειν; also HIPPOL. 4: φῶς ὁρῶντες ἡλίου; PHOENISS: εἰ λεύσσει φάος.—Ver. 8. But if a man live many years. כִּי here greatly increases the intensity of thought (comp. Job vi. 21; Hosea x. 5); it is consequently to have no closer connection with the following אִם; comp. Prov. ii. 8; Isa. x. 22, etc.—And rejoice in them all; [ZÖCKLER renders: Let him rejoice in them all];* therefore daily and constantly rejoice, in harmony with the apostolic injunction, χαίρετε πάντοτε. See the "Doctrinal and Ethical" to know how this sentence is to be reconciled, in Koheleth's sense, with the truth that all is vanity, and at the same time to be defended against the charge of Epicurean levity.—Yet let him remember the days of darkness, for they shall be many. כִּי is here the relative, not the causal ὅτι; comp. the Septuagint: καὶ μνησθήσεται τὰς ἡμέρας τοῦ σκότους, ὅτι πολλαὶ ἔσονται. "The days of darkness are those to be passed after this life in Scheol, the dark prison beneath the earth (chap. ix. 10), the days when we shall no longer see the pleasant light of the sun, or the period of death;" comp. Job x. 21, f.; xiv. 22; Ps. lxxxviii. 12, etc.—All that cometh is vanity; that is, that cometh in this world; everything that exists in this life, consequently all men especially; comp. chap. vi. 4; John i. 9. Nevertheless the translation should not be in the masculine; the Septuagint is correct: πᾶν τὸ ἐρχόμενον, ματαιότης. The sense given by VAIHINGER and ELSTER is too broad: "All future things are vanity." But even this is more correct than the Vulgate and LUTHER, who refer שֶׁבָּא to the past. Moreover the clause is a confirmation of what precedes, though used without a connective, and therefore making a still greater impression.—Ver. 9. Rejoice, O young man in thy youth.—Here we again have a vividly emphatic omission of the connective. That which the previous verse recommended in general, is now specially addressed to youth as that period of life especially favorable to cheerful enjoyment, and therefore, in accordance with God's will, especially appointed thereto. But the necessary check is indeed immediately placed upon this rejoicing, by the reminder of the duty to forget not that God will bring to judgment. בְּ in בְּיַלְדוּתֶךָ does not give the cause or object of rejoicing, but, as also in בִּימֵי in the following clause (comp. Isa. ix. 2), the period and circumstances in which it is to occur.—And let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth.† For this expression comp. i. 17;

*[XI. 8. בְּכֻלָּם יִשְׂמָח. To take this as an exhortation: "Let him rejoice," etc., would not seem very congruous to what follows: "let him remember the days of darkness," which is certainly not a joyful thought. Our English translators have inserted the conjunction: "and in them all rejoice," which gives the spirit of the passage, although there is no ו in the Hebrew. The better way is to regard the particles כִּי and אִם as affecting both the futures, the second as well as the first, whilst the third, introduced by the conjunction, is the one exhortation of the sentence, to which the others are preparatory: "For if a man shall live many years, if he shall rejoice in them all," or as it is elliptically, yet most literally, expressed in the Metrical Version—

Yet if a man live many years, in all of them rejoice,
The days of darkness let him not forget.

Or it may be the imperative style with the conditional aspect: let him live, let him rejoice, (that is, though he live, though he rejoice) yet let him remember, etc. In such a rendering there is no discord in the thought.—T. L.]

†[Ver. 9. בְּחוּרוֹתֶךָ, a rising upon the word יַלְדוּת childhood, as is seen by the parallelism. It is the period of

iii. 18; vii. 25, etc. The heart delights the whole man in proportion as it itself is טוֹב, that is, of good cheer.—And walk in the ways of thine heart, i. e., in the ways in which it will go; follow it. Comp. Isa. lvii. 17 and for the thought above chap. ii. 10.—And in the sight of thine eyes, i. e., so that thy observation of things shall form the rule for thy conduct, (comp. iii. 2–8). This is in accordance with the k'ri בְּמַרְאֵה, which is attested by all versions and manuscripts; the ketib בְּמַרְאֵי which is preferred by HENGSTENBERG and others, would designate the multitude of the objects of sight as the rule for walking, which, as HITZIG correctly observes, would be an intolerable zeugma. We moreover decidedly condemn the addition of לֹא before בְּמַרְאֵה: "and not according to the sight of thine eyes," as is found in the Codex Vaticanus of the Septuagint, and in the Jewish Haggada; for the passage in Numb. xv. 39, that probably furnished the inducement to this interpolation, is not, when rightly comprehended, in antagonism with the present admonition; for quite as certain* as the allusion is there to amorous looks of lust, is it here, on the contrary, to an entirely innocent use of sight, and one well-pleasing to God.—But know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee to judgment. Comp. Job xi. 6. The judgment (מִשְׁפָּט) is very certainly not merely to be considered as one of this world, consisting of the pains of advanced age (HITZIG), described in chap. xii. 1, ff., or of human destinies as periods of the revelation of divine retributive justice in general (CLERICUS, WINZER, KNOBEL, ELSTER, etc.). The author rather has in view the "judgment" in the absolute sense, the great reckoning after death, the last judgment, as the parallels Ps. cxliii. 2; Job xiv. 3; xix. 29, etc.,† incontestably show (comp. also Heb. ix. 27; x. 27); the preludes of the final judgment belonging to this life come into view only as subordinate. Neither ver. 8 of this chapter nor chap. ix. 10 are opposed to this; for Koheleth in these teaches not an eternal, but only a long sojourn in Scheol. Our interpretation receives also the fullest confirmation in chap. iii. 17 as in chap. xii. 7, 14.—Ver. 10. Therefore remove sorrow from thy heart. The positive command to rejoice, is here followed by the warning against the opposite of rejoicing כַּעַס "sorrow, dissatisfaction;" the Septuagint, Vulgate, GEIER, etc.. most unfittingly render it "anger," just as the following, רָעָה which means "evil, misfortune," they render, "wickedness," (πονηρία, malitia). The recommendation to cheerfulness instead of sadness and melancholy (comp. Mal. iii. 14; Isa. lviii. 3) is here clearly continued; comp. chap. ix. 7, ff. For בָּשָׂר in the second clause, comp. chap. v. 6.—For childhood and youth are vanity. The figure (הַשַּׁחֲרוּת a later expression for שַׁחַר; comp. the Talmudic שַׁחֲרִית), and the thing compared (הַיַּלְדוּת also a later word) are here, as in chap. v. 2; vii. 1, connected by a simple copula. Koheleth would have written more clearly, but less poetically and effectively if he had said "for as the dawn of the morning so is the period of youth all vanity" (i. e., transitory, fleeting. comp. vii. 6; ix. 9).

[KOHELETH'S DESCRIPTION OF OLD AGE, chap. xii.—The imagery and diction of this remarkable passage show it to be poetry of the highest order; but it presents a very gloomy picture. Even as a description of the ordinary state of advanced life, it is too dark. It has no relief, none of those cheering features, few though they may be, which Cicero presents in his charming treatise De Senectute. As a representation of the old age of the godly man, it is altogether unfitting. Compare it with the שֵׂיבָה טוֹבָה, the "good old age" of Abraham and David, Gen. xv. 15, 1 Chron. xxix. 28, the serene old age of Isaac, the honored old age of Jacob, the hale old age of Moses and Joshua. See how Isaiah (xl. 30, 31) describes the aged who wait upon the Lord: "The youths may faint and be weary, even the young men may utterly fail, but they who wait on Jehovah shall renew their strength, they shall mount up on wings as eagles, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint." A more direct contrast is furnished by the striking picture of aged saints, Ps. xcii. 15: They are like the grandæval cedars of Lebanon; "planted in the house of the Lord, they shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing" (more correctly, "still resinous and green"), be evergreens; or, as WATTS has most beautifully paraphrased it,

> The plants of grace shall ever live;
> Nature decays, but grace must thrive;

commencing manhood. Its etymological sense would be the choice period of life, from בחר primary sense, that of exploring, proving (the keen eye), hence choosing, selecting that which is most precious. From this the idea of excellence, superiority. In the noun בָּחוּר, it is taken collectively for the youth, the choice young men, as in Isaiah xl. 29, where, in the parallelism it is a rising on נְעָרִים, "the youths shall be weary, even the young men shall utterly fail." Here it is an abstract noun in the fem. plural, to denote intensity. We have the masculine plural in the same way, Numb. xi. 28. It is of the same form, in the masculine, with זְקֻנִים an intensive form to denote extreme feebleness of age. This is the direct opposite.—T. L.]

*[How is it "certain," unless it be that the hard necessities of this exegesis demand such an assertion? The two expressions are precisely alike, both in their letter and their spirit. There is nothing said, Numb. xv. 39, about "amorous looks," since the word זְנִים applies to any evil desire, any going away after the eye (see Ps. lxxiii. 27), and is often used of idolatry. The term מַרְאֶה, which is so much used of female beauty, suggests the idea here, more than any thing in the other passage. Everywhere else this kind of language, "following the heart," the "desires of the heart," "going after the eye," the sense (compare Job xxxi. 7), is used in malam partem, and to give it just the contrary sense here, as something "well pleasing to God," is to abandon every safe guide in interpretation. See the remarks on the solemn and sorrowful irony of this passage, in connection with ix. 7–9: Note on the Alleged Epicureanism of Koheleth; p. 132.—T. L.]

†[Still more striking allusions to such a judgment may be found Ps. i. 5; Job xxi. 30, the יוֹם אֵיד, the יוֹם עֲבָרוֹת, the dies iræ (irarum) "to which the wicked are reserved;" as also to Psalm xlix. 15, "the morning (לַבֹּקֶר) in which the just shall triumph."—T. L.]

Time that doth all things else impair,
Still makes them flourish, strong and fair.
Laden with fruits of age they show,
The Lord is holy, just and true;
None that attend His gates shall find,
A God unfaithful or unkind.

Another very striking contrast to this is that picture which Solomon twice gives us in the Proverbs xvi. 31, and xx. 29, "the hoary head a crown of glory when found in the way of righteousness." But one supposition remains; the picture here given is the old age of the sensualist. This appears, too, from the connection. It is the "evil time," the "day of darkness" that has come upon the youth who was warned in the language above, made so much more impressive by its tone of forecasting irony. It is the dreary old age of the young man who would "go on in every way of his heart, and after every sight of his eyes,"—who did not "keep remorse from his soul, nor evils from his flesh"—and now all these things are come upon him, with no such alleviations as often accompany the decline of life. Such also might be the inference from the words with which the verse begins: "Remember thy Creator while the evil days come not" (עַד אֲשֶׁר לֹא). It expresses this and more. There is a negative prohibitory force in the עַד אֲשֶׁר: So remember Him that the evil days come not,—"before they come," implying a warning that such coming will be a consequence of the neglect. Piety in youth will prevent such a realizing of this sad picture; it will not keep off old age, but it will make it cheerful and tolerable, instead of the utter ruin that is here depicted.

Another argument is drawn from the character of the imagery. The general representation is that of the decay of a house, or rather of a household establishment, as a picture of man going to his eternal house, his בֵּית עוֹלָם, ἀΐδιον οἴκησιν. This earthly house (ἐπίγειος οἰκία, 2 Cor. v. 1) is going to ruin, but the style of the habitation is so pictured as to give us some idea of the character of the inhabitant. It is not the cottage of the poor, nor the plain mansion of the virtuous contented. It is the house of the rich man (Luke xvi. 19) who has "fared sumptuously (λαμπρῶς, splendidly) every day." The outward figure is that of a lordly mansion,—a palace or castle with its "keepers," its soldiers, or "men of might," its purveyors of meal and provisions, its watchers on the turrets. It is a luxurious mansion with its gates once standing wide open to admit the revellers, now closing to the street. The images that denote these different parts of the body, the different senses or gates of entrance to the soul, are all so chosen as to indicate the kind of man represented. It is the eye that looked out for every form of beauty, the mouth (the teeth) that demanded supplies of the most abundant and delicious food. It is the ear that sought for "singing women," כָּל בְּנוֹת הַשִּׁיר, the loudest and most famed of the "daughters of song." And so, too, the appurtenances at the close of the description, the hanging lamps, the golden bowl, the costly fountain machinery all falling into ruin, present the same indications of character, and of the person represented.

Another very special mark of this may be traced in the expression וְתָפֵר הָאֲבִיּוֹנָה ver. 5, rendered, "desire shall fail," rather, "shall be frustrated," still raging but impotent. How characteristic of the old sensualist, and yet how different from the reality in the virtuous old age that has followed a temperate and virtuous youth! See how Cicero speaks of such failure of desire as a release, a relief, instead of a torment: libenter vero istinc, tanquam a domino furioso, profugi; De Senectute, 47. This view is rendered still stronger, if we follow those commentators who would regard אֲבִיּוֹנָה as denoting an herb used for the excitement of failing desire: It shall fail to have its effect. The meaning seems plain, however, as commonly taken, and there is, perhaps, no good reason for departing from the etymological sense. Everything goes to show that Watts has rightly paraphrased the passage—

Behold the aged sinner goes,
Laden with guilt and heavy woes,
Down to the regions of the dead.

The soul returns murmuringly to God, as though with its complaint of the cruel and degrading treatment it had received from "the fleshly nature" "in the earthly house," or as a wailing ghost "driven away" (see Prov. xiv. 32), naked and shivering into the uncongenial spiritual sphere.

It is in view of such a life, and such a death, that we see the force of the closing exclamation—"O vanity of vanities—all vanity!" As a finale to the life and death of the righteous, even if the writer, like Solon, had had reference only to this world, it would have seemed inharmonious and out of place. If we regard it, however, as Solomon's picture of himself repenting in extremis, then may we indulge a more cheerful hope in regard to its close, though still with the wail of vanity as its mournful accompaniment. One thing seems almost certain. Such a description as this, so sad, so full of feeling, must have been written by one who had had some experience of the situation described. There is a pathos about it that indicates personality, and a personal repentance. If so, no one is so readily suggested as the king of Israel, whose fall into sensuality and idolatry is so vividly described, 1 Kings xi., where the divine judgments upon him are also fully set forth. His repentance is not there mentioned, but it may be because this book of Koheleth, which he left behind him as his brief spiritual autobiography, contained such ample evidence of the fact.—T. L.]

5. Third strophe. Chap. xii. 1-7. An admonition to fear God during youth, and not to leave this till old age, the period when approaching death announces itself through many terrors—here depicted in a series of poetical figures drawn from the various realms of nature and human life.—Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth. For the plural בּוֹרְאֶיךָ see chap. v. 8 preceding. The word "remember" (זְכֹר) is, of course, a remembering with becoming reverence, as well as with a feeling of gratitude for the many blessings received. It is therefore substantially the same with the fear expressly recommended in chap. xii. 13, and in substance, at least, in chap. xi. 9, second clause.—While the evil days come not. Literally, "until not," i. e., "before;" just as in ver. 2 and in the later recapitulation ver. 6. The "evil days," and the "years" following are naturally the years of old age, of the period immediately preceding death, in contradistinction to the joyous period of youth.—Ver. 2. While the sun, or the light,* or the moon or the stars be not darkened. The darkening of the sun and the light must here be synonymous with the diminishing and the saddening of the joys of life, as is experienced in advanced age. A more special interpretation of the sun and the light, as well as of the moon and the stars (only added to finish the description), is inadmissible, and leads to platitudes, as is the case with GLASSIUS, OETING, and F. W. MEYER, who think of the darkening powers of the mind or with WEDEL, who would interpret the sun by the heart, the moon by the brain, the stars by the bowels (!), and the clouds and rain, even, by the catarrhal rheums of old age (!). Moreover the darkening of sun, moon and stars is a favorite figure for seasons of misfortune, punishment and judgment; comp. Joshua iii. 4; ii. 10; Amos viii. 9; Isa. xiii. 10; Ezek. xxxii. 7; Acts ii. 20; Rev. vi. 12. The same is also found in classic authors, e. g., Catullus viii. 3; Fulsere quondam candidi tibi soles; Martial Epigr. v. 20, 11: Bonosque soles effugere atque abire sentit.—Nor the clouds return after the rain. That is, one calamity follows another, one season of misfortune begins where the other ceases. The rainy season, or winter, is therewith described, in contrast to the mere showers or passing thunder storms of summer. Old age is symbolized as the winter† (or autumn of life, as it has previously been termed the approaching night; comp. Job xxix. 3; where the mature age of man is designated as "the days of autumn" (יְמֵי חָרְפִּי). So we too sometimes speak of the evening, the autumn, and the winter of life.—Vers. 3-5. A more intimate figurative description of old age's infirmity and proximity to death. This is here represented under the figure of a house whose inhabitants, formerly cheerful and animated, now become weak, inactive and sad. UMBREIT and ELSTER condemn this view as harsh and devoid of taste, and consider the passage rather as a poetic description of the day of death, which is represented under the figure of a fearful tempest, see especially GURLITT, Studien und Kritiken, 1865, II., p. 331, ff. (comp. p. 27, preceding). Comp. also the subsequent remarks under the head of Doctrinal and Ethical.—In the day when the keepers of the house shall tremble. The human body is often compared to a house* or a tent, e. g., Isa. xxxviii. 12; Wisdom ix. 15; Job iv. 19; 2 Cor. v. 1, ff.; 2 Peter i. 13, f. So also in profane writings, e. g., in the Arabian poet HARIRI, (RUECKERT's Ed., p. 293); in Virgil, Eneid VI., 734. The "keepers of the house" are the arms with the hands, that are intended to protect the body, but which become tremulous in aged persons. These are considered as outside of the house, but as closely belonging to it. For the use of the hands as protection and armor for the body, comp. GALEN, de usu partium I., (4 Opp. ed. KUEHN T., III., p. 8).—And the strong men shall bow themselves. That is, evidently the legs, which in old age lose their muscular power; whilst in the young, strong man they may be compared to marble columns, (comp. Song of Solomon v. 10), they now shrink and become feeble, and crooked. Comp. the "crooked knees" of Job iv. 4; the "weak knees" of Ps. cix. 24; "the feeble knees," Isa. xxxv. 3; Heb. xii. 12; also 3 Mac. iv. 5. "Men of strength," is, on the contrary, a designation for valiant warriors: Judges xx. 44; 2 Sam. xi. 16; 2 Kings xxiv. 16; and to these especially strong legs are very necessary: see Ps. cxlvii. 10; 2 Sam. i. 23, etc.—And the grinders cease† because they are few. הַטֹּחֲנוֹת "the grinding maids" are to be construed as referring to the teeth, as is also shown by כִּי מִעֵטוּ, "for they have become few," and by the subsequent mention of the "sound of the mill," i. e., of the human speech proceeding from the wall of the teeth (ver. 4). The closeness of the comparison between human teeth and a mill is proved by the designation "grinders," for the molar teeth in many languages, e. g., in the Syriac (טחנות), in the Greek (μύλακροι μολοδοντες), in the Latin (molares). The feminine form is in allusion to the custom

*[Ver. 2. "Whilst the sun or the light." This is not a tautology; nor does it mean the light as an element. That would be too abstract for such a writing as this. ABEN EZRA gives a good interpretation in referring it to the morning light that precedes the sun rising. This is essentially the same with the light of the sun, but is phenomenally and poetically different.—T. L.

† Ver. 2. "And the clouds return after the rain." There is no need of regarding this as denoting the winter season. It represents the subjective state of the old man. In youth the sunshine is predominant. The cloudy days are little remembered. The sun is ever coming out, or as it is expressed in the beautiful language of 2 Sam. xxiii. 4, it is ever נֹגַהּ מִמָּטָר, "clear shining after rain." In old age, especially the old age of the sensualist, who has no spiritual sun to cheer him, it is just the reverse. The clouds seem ever coming back. It is all dark, or the intervals of sunshine seem brief and evanescent.—T. L.]

*[Ver. 3. שֹׁמְרֵי הַבַּיִת, "The keepers of the house." HITZIG recognizes the comparison, throughout, of the human body to a house, but he trifles when he says, that this is suggested by the mention of the rain in ver. 2, and that the figure is used because a house is made of loam and white bricks that are dissolved and worn away by the showers. Every thing goes to show that there is had in view, rather, the decay of some lordly mansion, the richly furnished house of some Dives, "who had fared sumptuously every day," or of a castle with its apparatus of war and luxury, as we have said p. 153.—T. L.]

*[Ver. 3. בָּטְלוּ. "The grinders fail." It is rendered cease in our E. V. ZÖCKLER, feiern, to rest, keep holiday. GESENIUS, the same. feriati sunt. It is one of the words of this book reckoned to the later Hebrew. It is common, however, to all Shemitic tongues, and there is no reason why it should be regarded as either unhebraic, or as late in the Hebrew. Those who argue from its rare, or single, occurrence, should show that there is any other place in the scanty Hebrew writings we have, where it would have been more suited to the idea than the word or words used. The rendering of ZÖCKLER and GESENIUS would make it synonymous with שָׁבַת, but this is not its sense in the Arabic and Syriac, and an examination of passages would show how unsuitable it would have been as a substitute for שָׁבַת, to cease, rest, keep holiday, in any of the many places where the latter occurs. Its true sense is to fail, or rather, to be worn out, to become useless. It may, therefore, be regarded as an old Hebrew word, but as used in this place only, because it is the only one in which its peculiar sense was required.—T. L.]

of all antiquity, according to which female slaves performed the grinding with hand-mills (Ex. xi. 5; Job xxxi. 10; Isa. xlvii. 2; Matt. xxiv. 41), and is also in harmony with the use of שֵׁן (tooth) as feminine, occurring in Prov. xxv. 19. —And those that look out of the windows be darkened. These are the eyes,* that are here the more fittingly designated as הָרֹאוֹת בָּאֲרֻבּוֹת, because עַיִן the "eye" is feminine, and since the eyelids, in other passages compared to the threads of a net (Prov. vi. 25), are here clearly compared to the bars of a grate or to the grating (אֲרֻבּוֹת), and since also it was very natural to present the eyes, the most noble of all our organs, as the mistresses of the house, who look quietly out into the exterior world, but the teeth on the contrary as the servants or slaves. Comp. CICERO Tusc. I., 20: Oculi quasi fenestræ sunt animi; foramina illa, quæ patent ad animum a corpore, callidissimo artificio natura fabricata est; also LACTANTIUS, de opif. Dei, c. 8; CLEMENS, Stromata, VII., p. 685, § . Talmud tract, Schabb. p. 152, col. 1; BUXTORF, Florileg. p. 320). Those looking out of the windows are said to be darkened with reference to the feebleness of sight in old persons, e. g., Isaac (Gen. xxvii. 1), Jacob (Gen. xlviii. 10), Eli (1 Sam. iii. 2), Ahia (1 Kings xiv. 4), etc.; comp. also Ps. lxix. 23; Lam. v. 17; Deut. xxxiv. 7.—Ver. 4. And the doors shall be shut in the streets. Namely, the mouth* whose upper and lower lips are compared to the two sides or folds of a door (דְּלָתַיִם); comp. Ps. cxli. 8; Micah vii. 5; Job xli. 6. בַּשּׁוּק literally, "on the street," points to the function of the mouth as a means of communication with the outer world, whether by the reception of food or the sending out of words or other sounds As the latter reference is not so close, and would anticipate the subsequent clause, we are doubtless to think of the mouth as the organ of eating, and the shutting of the doors as an allusion to the feeble appetite of old men, [in this EWALD is correct, in opposition to KNOBEL, VAIHINGER, etc.]. HERZFELD and HITZIG are entirely too artificial: "the lips of the toothless mouth cling together;" but HENGSTENBERG also says: "the shutting of the doors refers to the difficulty of hearing in old men, a common infirmity with them that would not be wanting here" (?!).—When the sound of the grinding is low. ZÖCKLER translates: "the voice of the mill." The mill is the teeth,† according to ver. 8; its voice

*[Ver. 3. "And they who look out of the windows be darkened" (הָרֹאוֹת בָּאֲרֻבּוֹת). All agree that this means the eyes in respect to the body; but what does it stand for in the figure, or parallel representation of the mansion? To this ZÖCKLER does not advert except in what he says about the "mistresses," which is very inadequate and unpicturesque. His remarks, too, about the eyelids, and "the threads of a net," with his reference to Prov. vi. 25, are fanciful prettinesses, which seem out of place in so serious yet so animated a description. The question is, what places and persons are meant? There is something here instructive of the character of the house that is pictured. As it had "its strong men," its אַנְשֵׁי הֶחָיִל, so these are the castle-watchers who look out from the turrets, or rather, at or by the turrets (ב instead of מ). If we are to be governed by the gender of רֹאוֹת, we should think of women employed for that purpose, which would suit well enough,—the strong men being otherwise employed—but the gender may have been controlled by the thought of the thing represented, the eyes, which in Hebrew, are feminine. The word, אֲרֻבּוֹת, does not mean the ordinary windows of a house (חַלּוֹנִים), but some opening high up, in the roof, or in a turret. This is shown from all its uses, as in Gen. vii. 11, viii. 12, 2 Kings vii. 19, Isa. xxiv. 15, Malachi iii. 10, in all of which places it is rendered the windows of heaven (supposed openings in the sky) Hosea xiii. 3, where it means chimneys, and Isa. lx. 8, where it is used diminutively for the openings in the dove houses. Here, therefore, it must mean turret windows or openings, where the watchers are stationed, and this is in harmony with the usual sense of the verb ארב, to lie in wait, to watch. There is a striking pictorial propriety in this which has led to similar representations by other ancient writers. "Thus" the sight (says PLATO in the Timæus, 90 A), "as the noblest of the senses, is placed in the highest part" ἐπ' ἄκρῳ τῷ σώματι. So CICERO De Nat. Deorum, II., 140, Sensus autem, interpretes ac nuntii rerum, in capite, tanquam in arce, collocuti sunt: "The senses, as interpreters and messengers of things without, are placed in the head as in a watch tower." "And this," he says, "is especially true of the eyes as watchers:" nam oculi, tanquam speculatores, altissimum locum obtinent, ex quo plurima conspicientes funguntur suo munere. Compare also Xenophon Memorabilia Lib. I., ch. iv. 11, where we have the same idea as in the well-known passage from Ovid Met. I., 85:

Os homini sublime dedit, cœlumque tueri,

*[Ver. 4. "And the doors shall be shut in the streets;" or rather, "the doors to the street" (the street doors) are shut (becoming shut, closing; see Metrical Version). The reference of this to the mouth, which began with JEROME, has been the occasion of much false interpretation, both here and in what follows. The dual number is just as applicable to the eyes and ears as to the lips. It agrees, therefore, far better with the whole context, to take it as HENGSTENBERG does, of the ears closing to sounds, or rather, of all the senses, as the avenues to the outer world. To say that this is too remote or abstract a sense for Koheleth, is to overlook the whole scope of this most thoughtful representation, and to fail in appreciating the spirit of its grand poetry. The old sensualist, he who had lived so much abroad, and so little at home, is shut in at last. Again, the language is inconsistent with the other and more limited view. With no propriety could the mouth be called the street door, through which the master of the house goes abroad; especially when regarded, as this interpretation mainly regards the mouth, in its eating or masticating function It is rather the door to the interior, the cellar door, that leads down to the stored or consumed provision, the stomach, or belly. The word בַּשּׁוּק whether we render it in the street, or to the street, would be altogether out of place in such a narrow view, and more especially since שׁוּק has such a wide meaning (platea, wide place, foras, abroad), comp. v. 5, Prov. vii. 5, Cantic. iii. 2. —T. L.]

†[Ver. 4. "When the sound of the grinding is low." In ver. 3 the טֹּחֲנוֹת, or female servants who grind the meal in the rich mansion, undoubtedly represent the teeth; that is, the term is directly metaphorical. Here, on the other hand, הַטַּחֲנָה, the grinding, or the mill, is not so much metaphorical as illustrative. It is to be taken, therefore, in its primary sense as a fact showing the old man's dullness of hearing. The most familiar and household sounds, such as that of the grinding mill, are faintly distinguished. The making it represent the mouth masticating, as a mill grinding, has given rise to a great many disagreeable and very unpoetical images, marring, as STUART admits, the otherwise admirable propriety, or keeping, of the picture. The mill, it is said, is the old man's collapsed mouth; the low sound of the grinding is the mumbling noise made by his feeble chewing, the "sinking daughters of song" are his feeble piping. Commentators seem to have vied with each other here in the exercise of their ingenuity. Some of these most unpoetical critics have referred the low grinding sound to the rumbling noises in the belly and stomach arising from poor digestion (see their names in GEIER, also the commentators cited in POLE's Synopsis). STUART says truly: "none of these interpretations (whether referring to the chewing or the piping, or the digestion) are very inviting," and yet he is not prepared to give any other. He says well that "eating seems to be dispatched in the 3d verse, and there is an incongruity is not, however, the noise caused by the chewing of food—which would be very harsh and unnatural (contrary to Ewald, et al.), but human speech breathed out, as it were, from the wall of the teeth [ἕρκος ὀδόντων], that voice which in old age usually becomes weaker and lower.—And he shall rise up at the voice of the bird. Zöckler translates: "and it seems like the voice of the sparrow." Ewald and Hitzig are correct [in regard to the impersonal rendering of יָקוּם] with reference to Isa. xxix. 24, where also a weak voice is compared to the low chirping, if not of the sparrow, at least of some other small birds. It is usually rendered (Sept., Vulg., Luther, Knobel, Vaihinger, etc.: "and he rises up at the voice of the birds," i. e., in the early morning—which might also afford an allusion to the sleeplessness of old men. But it is more than doubtful whether קום לְקוֹל הַצִּפּוֹר should express this sense of early rising. Instead of יָקוּם we should in that case have expected יָעִיר. And early rising is by no means a general custom of old men, and—what seems more weighty than all the rest—the context requires a reference to the low, whispering speech of old men; see the following clause. For קום לְ in the sense here given to it, comp. Zeph. iii. 8; 1 Sam. xxii. 13.—And all the daughters of music shall be brought low, that is, all the songs in which the old man endeavors to join, but which he utters only with a trembling, and scarcely audible voice. The "daughters" of a thing means in Hebrew style its special or specific announcement or utterance; comp. the Rabbinic בַּת קוֹל as well as the expression "Son of fruitfulness," Isa. v. 1, etc. Hitzig is correct, and Hengstenberg substantially so, who understands by the "daughters of song" the qualities required in singing. But Knobel is arbitrary, who, with Herzfeld, sees in the singers only singing birds (according to which the failing here described would be the deafness of the old man); Vaihinger sees an allusion to the organs of singing; and, finally, Umbreit and Elster understand the passage to be about the low flight of birds, and their uneasy fluttering at an approaching thunder storm.—Ver. 5. The discourse continues to depend on בַּיּוֹם שֶׁ at the beginning of the third verse, if not grammatically, at least logically.—Also when they shall be afraid of that which is high; i. e., of ascending an eminence which would be difficult on account of their sunken chests, and short breath; a remark in sympathy with what precedes concerning the feeble voice of old men. Nearly all modern commentators are correct on this point, as is now Ewald, who formerly translated: "when they shall be afraid of the Lofty One," that is of God, the one supremely lofty.—And fears shall be in the way; namely, "threaten" them, "meet" them, who are too lame and weak easily too avoid such frights. For the abstract form of the plural חַתְחַתִּים, see Ewald, § 179, a.—And the almond tree shall flourish. Thus we must, without doubt, translate the words יָנֵאץ הַשָּׁקֵד, for יָנֵץ (Hiphil of נצץ). For this compare Ewald, § 15, a.;

in supposing it to be again introduced here." The incongruity is all the greater from bringing this lowest part of the human economy, (even if it had not already had place enough) between the two noblest senses; for what follows (בנות השיר), undoubtedly refers to the hearing; or else (which would indeed be most strange) there is no notice taken at all of this most important function. We would not hesitate, therefore, to refer this clause also to that sense. There is, too, a wonderful pictorial propriety in it, when we consider the important part which this grinding, and its constant sound, must have borne in an ancient wealthy mansion. From the want of outside mills, this domestic occupation was in continual demand for the daily provisioning; and, in a large house, or castle, it must have employed a great many servants. It was generally done by women, and to this our Saviour refers, Matt. xxiv. 41, Luke xvii. 35: "Two women shall be grinding together." They must have been constantly at work to supply the demand for bread at every meal. Day and night "the sound of the grinding" was heard, like that which proceeded from the tired and drowsy female slaves in the house of Ulysses; as described in the Odyssey XX., 109:

Αἱ μεν ἄρ' ἄλλαι εὗδον, ἐπὲι κατὰ πυρὸν ἄλεσσαν,
Ἡ' δὲ μί' ὄυπω πανέτ', ἀφαυροτάτη δ' ἐτέτυκτο,
'Η ῥα μυλην στήσασα, ἔπος φάτο, σῆμα ἄνακτι.

The rest had lain them down to sleep, their weary task was done;
One still kept on the ceaseless toil, the weakest of them all;
When suddenly she stopped the mill, and spake aloud the sign.

The account is very touching. It is very late at night, and near the dawn. These poor wearied creatures, who had been grinding all day for the rapacious suitors, finish their long tasks, one after another, and lie down, overcome by fatigue and drowsiness, until one alone is left in her late hour of toil. In answer to the prayer of Ulysses, Zeus had given the signal thunder in the early cloudless sky. Startled at the sound she stops the mill, and hails it as a signal of deliverance, whilst Ulysses recognizes her words as an auspicious omen.

There was hardly any part of the day or night when this work was not going on with its ceaseless noise. It was, indeed, a sign, then, that the senses were failing in their office (בִּשְׁלֹג), when this familiar, yet very peculiar, sound of the grinding had ceased to arrest the attention, or had become low and obscure.

When the hum of the mill is faintly heard,
And the daughters of song are still.

It is from this, too, that the words וְיָקוּם לְקוֹל הַצִּפּוֹר, which have been so much misunderstood, get their clearest exposition. יָקוּם has for its subject, not the old man, but "the sound of the grinding," the last grammatical antecedent, and it presents a contrast, as Hitzig says, with שפל preceding, as well as with יִשַּׁחוּ following. "Though it rise to the sparrow's note"—"attain unto," as קוּם, with לְ following, is used Zeph iii. 8, 1 Sam. xxii. 13, Mic. ii. 8,—referring not so much to loudness, or volume of sound, as to that sharp, shrill noise which was ever ringing in the ears of others. Its real sound, shrill as the sparrow's voice, is put in contrast with the dull droning sound that reaches the old man's ears. What follows would seem to put this interpretation beyond doubt. The term daughter (בת) is used in Hebrew, not as Zöckler takes it, but to intensify, to give the very best of a thing. בְּנוֹת הַשִּׁיר, "daughters of song," then, does not necessarily mean singers, though it may have that sense, but may be understood of "the loudest songs," or the loudest voices in the song. They are faintly heard; יִשַּׁחוּ they sink down. The sound they make to the old man is exactly represented by the same word, Isaiah xxix. 4, where we have also שפל used as it is here: "And thou shalt speak low out of the ground (שִׁפְלַת תְּדַבֵּרִי), and thy speech shall sound low (תִּשַּׁח shall sink down) out of the dust, and thy voice shall be as of one that hath a familiar spirit, out of the ground, and shall whisper out of the dust." See Metrical Version.—T. L.]

§ 141, b. The almond tree bears its blossoms in the midst of winter,* and on a naked, leafless stem, and these blossoms (reddish or flesh-colored in the beginning) seem at the time of their fall exactly like white snow-flakes; (BODENSTEDT, 1001 Days in the Orient, II., p. 237). In this way the almond blossom is a very fitting symbol of old age with its silvery hair, and its wintry, dry, barren and unfruitful condition. EWALD, HEILIGSTEDT, VAIHINGER, and GURLITT, are correct; the first-named makes an appropriate reference to Philo, de vita Mosis iii. 22.—HENGSTENBERG's view is too far-fetched in finding in the words (according to Jerem. i. 11) the wakefulness, or sleepless nights of hoary old age; whilst SCHRÖDER, GESENIUS, DIETRICH, et al., consider יָנֵאץ as intrans. Fut. Hiph. from נאץ, and render: "And the almond is despised" (by the toothless old man who cannot bite it): others undertake emendations, e. g., GAAB, who reads יִנָּאֵץ "is despised," HITZIG, who points it יִנְאַץ and thus obtains the scarcely intelligible sense: "And the Almond tree refuses," i. e., does not permit the weak old man to obtain its fruit (which is to be understood according to the analogy of the Song of Solomon vii. 9). Still others, finally, force an unusual sense on the word שָׁקֵד as HAHN, who understands and translates it "the waking," referring it to the human mind; "the waking one acquires pinions," which is about equivalent to saying: "The previously half-wakened spirit is, in the moment of death, released unto clear life and full liberty" (against which explanation is the absence elsewhere of any Hiphil denominative הֵנֵץ from נוֹצָה "pinion."—And the Grasshopper shall be a burden (ZÖCKLER renders "burdensome"), on account of its singing and chirping, or also on account of its hopping flight and creeping. חָגָב literally, "locust," but here more fittingly translated by grasshopper, because, in rendering locust, it is most probably the comparative smallness, as in Isa. xl. 22; Numb. xiii. 34, which is mainly considered (as though we should say: "And the gnat becomes a burden, or the fly"). For יִסְתַּבֵּל (fut. Hithpa of סבל) "to become a burden," comp. GESENIUS in the Thesaurus. KIMCHI is correct regarding this, and he is followed by GURLITT, especially among modern authors, and approximately also by GESENIUS and HENGSTENBERG, of whom, however, the former thinks of the burdensomeness of the locust as an article of food, whilst the latter prefers to have locust understood figuratively in the sense of influences hostile to life. The numerous remaining hypotheses are to be decidedly rejected; they are divided into two groups, according as they interpret the locust as a symbol of the old man himself, that is as to the form of his body, or seek to alter the sense of חָגָב by peculiar explanations. To the former group belong the Septuagint, Vulgate, Syriac, etc., which agree in the signification that "the locust becomes fat" (swells up), and understand the whole, though in opposition to the true signification of הסתבל as a biblical representation of the corpulency of old men; and 2. those of LUTHER, GEIER, VAIHINGER, etc., who explain locust to mean the crooked or bent skeleton and spinal column of man in old age, and therefore translate: "The locust is burdened;" and 3. that of HITZIG: "And the jumper permits himself to be carried," i. e., the one formerly hopping merrily about can no longer walk: 4. that of OETINGER: "the locust becomes a burden to itself," i. e., "drags its body about with difficulty; 5. those of EWALD, HEILIGSTEDT, and HAHN, who agree in making locust point to the inner body, or to the mind of man (EWALD): and "the locust rises," namely to fly; HEILIGSTEDT: "et tollit se ad volandum locusta;" HAHN: "And the locust unburdens itself," which is equivalent to our expression: "And the butterfly bursts its cocoon." Among the second class we may count such illustrations as the Chaldaic, and that of Aben Ezra: "when the ankle-bones become thick;" that of BOCHART, "when the bones of the legs become heavy;" and of KNOBEL: "and the breathing is a burden" (the last two on the basis of a peculiar signification of חגב derived from the Arabic).*—And desire shall fail, that is, when neither the appetite nor sexual desire can be excited by so strong a stimulant as the caper-berry. *[Ver. 5. וְיָנֵאץ הַשָּׁקֵד, ZÖCKLER well defends here the old interpretation. The other mode of exegesis gives a poor and mean image, marring the poetry, and exceedingly far-fetched as a supposed trait of old age; whereas the comparison of the hoary head to a flowering tree is very striking, as well as natural. The old man's mouth, and eating powers had been treated of before (ad nauseam, we might say, if, with some critics, we allow a second reference to it in ver. 4, as well as in ver. 3), whilst it would indeed be a wonder if so marked a characteristic as the gray head had been wholly omitted. By changing the punctuation to יִנְאַץ, these critics would render it "the almond disgusts;" it is too hard a nut for the the old man's teeth to crack; or "the almond disgusts," because it is "sour grapes" to the old man; it grows so high he cannot get at it. For other incongruous imagery, see HITZIG and STUART. In regard to the orthography, whilst רְאֵם for רֵם (see Numb. xxiii. 22, Ps. xxix. 6, Ps. xxii. 22) presents a parallel to נֵאץ or נֵאץ for נֵץ, the other view of יָנֵאץ for יִנְאַץ is wholly unexampled. The objection from the color of the almond blossoms is well answered by ZÖCKLER. These difficulties settled, what can be more striking than the metaphor! A good parallel to it is found in SOPHOCLES' Electra 42, where it is said of the Tutor,

Οὐ γάρ σε μὴ γήρᾳ τε καὶ μακρῷ χρόνῳ
Γνῶσ', οὐδ' ὑποπτεύσουσιν, ὧδ' ΗΝΘΙΣΜΕΝΟΝ:

They'll know thee not,
Through age and time thus blossomed;
Nor even have suspicion who thou art.

Some would explain this of the flowers and garlands he is supposed to wear as a messenger: but the critical reader must see that this would be altogether out of keeping with the circumstances, as there detailed, and especially with the sad message he was supposed to bear. The other objection, made by BOTHE, that it would be a tautology with γήρᾳ (age), is very trifling. It is the very nature of poetry thus to intensify, and often by what would be tautology in prose. WUNDER gives an explanation from FR. JACOBSIUS, which refutes completely his own criticism, and that of BOTHE. He cites examples that put the meaning of SOPHOCLES beyond a doubt; as from Cyril c. Julian VI., p. 157, ὅτε λευκῇ πολιᾷ κατηνθισμένος; and another, where the same figure is applied to the beard, De Chryse sene Christodor. Ecphr. 90:

βαθὺς δὲ οἱ ἤνθεε πώγων.

Modern poetry has the same metaphor.—T. L.]

*[Most of these hypotheses seem absurd, and all of them inconsistent with the simplicity and directness of the whole picture. After all, none of them seem so obvious as that which is given by some Jewish commentators, and suggests itself directly from our common English Version: namely, that it is a hyperbolical expression of feebleness. "He cannot bear the least weight."—T. L.]

הָאֲבִיּוֹנָה has the meaning of "Caper" (κάππαρις) by the testimony of the oldest translators as well as of the Rabbins (comp. BUXTORF, Lex Rabb. et Talm., p. 12, 2098), and as the use of the berries or buds of the caper-bush undoubtedly stimulate the appetite, and, according to the ancient oriental representation a voluptuous desire (comp. also PLUTARCH, Sympos., 6; WINER, Real Lexicon, Art. Caper), the correctness of this interpretation is not to be doubted, and LUTHER's translation: "and all desire fails," appears at least consonant with the sense. Varying interpretations: 1) Septuagint, Vulgate, Syriac, Arabic; ROSENMUELLER, HEILIGSTEDT, EWALD, VAIHINGER: "and the caper bursts," i. e., the spirit presses forth as a kernel from the husk; 2. Vers. Veneta (παύση ἡ ὄρεξις) ABULWALID, LUTHER, HENGSTENBERG, etc.: "Since desire fails;" 3. SCHMIDT, DÖDERLEIN, etc.: "since the turtle-dove, the messenger of spring is despised;" 4. HAHN: "Since the poor one (fem. of אֶבְיוֹן) bursts forth," i. e., since the imprisoned soul bursts its prison, its mortal coil, etc. KNOBEL, HITZIG, and GURLITT are correct among the modern writers.—Because man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets. Clearly a parenthesis by which the previous description of the infirmities of age, especially that contained in the last three clauses, is strengthened by pointing to the imminent approach of death for the old man. Man passeth away, (הֹלֵךְ) i. e., he is on the point of going; comp. Gen. xix. 13, 14, etc. "His long home" is the grave, from which there is no more return to earthly life (comp. Job vii. 10; Ps. xlix. 12; Isa. xiv. 18, etc.). The same appellation is also found in Tob. iii. 6; Targ. Jonath. in Jes. xlii. 11; among the Egyptians (Diodorus Sic., i. 51). among the Arabians (Koran, Sur. xli. 28) and the Romans (domus æterna; marmorea domus, Tibull. Carm., III., 2, 22).

[THE ETERNAL HOUSE.—Ver. 5. בֵּית עֹלָמוֹ. ZÖCKLER's interpretation of this striking expression is scanty and misleading. It cannot, any more than Sheol, mean the grave simply. Without insisting upon the fact that the Hebrews had for that a distinct term (קֶבֶר), when nothing more was intended (see Bibelwerk Gen. 536), it may be said that the context almost immediately following is at war with such an idea. The expression here, had it stood alone, might have been regarded, perhaps, as a figurative one for extinction of all being. The "long home" might have been thought to denote the dark house of bodily dissolution and spiritual nothingness; though still it would be a question whether language, thus implying residence, permanence, and something like continuance of selfhood, could ever, even in figure, have arisen from such a nihility of conception. What is said, however, in ver. 7, forbids it altogether. The being of man, though one and inseparable in personality, is there regarded as locally divided: "The dust goes down to the earth, the spirit returns unto God who gave it." Now to predicate this residence of the dissolving dust alone does not satisfy the conception. The passage, Job vii. 10, to which ZÖCKLER refers, has no application, whatever; Isaiah xiv. 18 is only a highly figurative representation of the remains of monarchs, lying in state, or in their splendid mausoleums, and the בֵּית מוֹעֵד of Job xxx. 23, "the house of meeting," or of "the assembly," which he might more properly have cited, has the same meaning as in this place; and every argument against regarding it as the mere place of deposit for the decomposing remains, which are not man in any sense, is as applicable to the one place as to the other. There is equal difficulty in regarding it as any separate mansion of the spirit by itself. Neither can be said to be man, the personality, the self-hood, when separately viewed: and yet it is man himself that has gone to the house of his olam, or rather to his olamic house; since the pronoun in עֹלָמוֹ belongs to the whole compound taken as one epithet. God is spoken of as the מָעוֹן, "the dwelling-place" of His people (see Ps. xc. 1), but that cannot be the sense intended here; neither, on the other hand, can the "spirit's return to God" be regarded as a pantheistic absorption, as ZÖCKLER well shows. No theism was ever more clear of such an idea, or more opposed to Buddhism, whether in its ancient eastern, or its modern transcendental form, than that of the old Hebrews. Although in the Old Testament God is represented as אֱלֹהֵי רוּחוֹת (Numb. xvi. 22) "God of spirits," yet it would seem to go even to the extremes in setting forth His distinct and incommunicable personality, His unapproachable holiness, that is, His separation from all things, and all beings, even the highest whom He has created, or to whom He has given being. As it cannot, therefore, apply separately, either to the soul or the body, the term beth-olam must denote something consistent with such a modified being of both. It is clear, then, that it cannot express locality, nor even duration as such, but a state of being, unknown except as obscurely defined in what follows (ver. 7), though positive as a fact. This state of being is so called in distinction from the present being upon earth. Although the idea of place is thus excluded, yet the word בית is used as suggested by the previous figure of the decaying mansion. The "earthly house," ἡ ἐπίγειος ἡμῶν οἰκία, is dissolved, and now man goes to the οἰκία αἰώνιος, the olamic house, not under the law of space and time, "the house not made with hands,"—whatever it may mean, whether the same as, or less than, Paul intends by the use of similar language. The term beth-olam, however it may have been suggested here, is in striking accordance with the corresponding classical Greek usage of οἶκος 'Αἴδου (Homeric, δῶμ' 'Αΐδαο, 'Αΐδος δόμος) representing the other world, or the other condition of being, as a house, a home, or abode, though unseen and unknown. This was its pure primary sense and usage, denoting state alone, though afterwards the poetry and mythology gave it scenery and locality. עולם here corresponds to Hades in etymological significance, as well as in its manner of usage. It is the hidden, the unmeasured, as that is the unseen.

The idea of time, though in general inseparable, from עוֹלָם, is not here predominant. It certainly does not denote an absolute, endless eternity. And so another phrase, ἀΐδιος οἴκησις, as used in Greek (DIODORUS, XENOPHON, and PLATO: see Gen. p. 587) is etymologically the unseen, though coming to be used for eternal, or æonian, through the near relation, and frequent blending of the Hadean and the æonian, or olamic conceptions.

The view, then, of this phrase בית עולם which is least liable to objection, or on which we can most safely rely, is that which is content with regarding it as simply the antithesis of this present worldly state of being. There is suggested the same rendering (world) which we have given chap. i. 11, iii. 11, and ix. 7. It is the other world in distinction from this, whether regarded as lying parallel or as succeeding. It is the house in which the dead (who yet have some unknown being) are to abide, while the world lasts (even this world) as we have rendered לעולם. ix. 7, in the Metrical Version.

> Whilst the world lasts, no portion more have they,
> In all the works performed beneath the sun.

In the same manner also, in our modern language, do we speak of this world, and the other world. We use the latter term in two ways; 1) as the great world, or olam, which, as a whole, is historically to succeed this as a whole that shall have passed away; or 2) as the world into which each individual goes at death,—as though the finishing with this were virtually the entrance into that, although its historical manifestation for all men collectively may yet be far remote. Our mode of speech has not come from the Bible,—certainly not from the English Bible,—for its general mode of translating עולם vaguely by forever and everlasting, and its avoiding the rendering world, are unfavorable to it. It is a thought born in the modern as in the ancient mind, and existing from the earliest ages. It was accompanied by no knowledge, yet none the less tenaciously held. It was the goal of the Patriarch's pilgrimage idea. They were "going to Sheol," to the other world, yet all unknowing as Abraham was, when, at the command of God, he went out from Mesopotamia: ἐξῆλθε μὴ ἐπιστάμενος πõυ ἔρχεται, Heb. xi. 8. So "went they out" (from this world), confiding in God, hoping "for a better country," yet "not knowing whither they went," or having the least conception, perhaps, of the mode of being that was to follow.

We are simply told of the fact: man goes to the olam, the beth-olam, to the other world, and there the Old Testament leaves him; and leaves the interpreter to give it as high or as low a sense as his spiritual-mindedness or lack of spiritual-mindedness may lead him to prefer. It speaks of it as a state, but throws no light upon it as a mode of being. It is not wholly a blank, but in almost everything we deem of highest worldly importance, it is set forth as the opposite of the present life. These images, however, of stillness, unknowingness, (not to say unconsciousness), inactivity, want of interest, in a word, lack of vitality, as we would call it, and which would seem to reduce it almost to an embryo existence (see ix. 5, and note p. 129), may be because the impossibility of our conceiving it aright, and the consequent veil of reserve which the old Scripture throws over the whole subject, leaves little else to the picturing imagination than a description of negatives. Any premature development in the other direction might have falsely stimulated the fancy, and led the divinely guarded people of God into many of those wild conceptions which so deform the Heathen mythologies of Hades, or the world of the dead.

In respect to other great ideas, however, as connected with such a state, the Old Testament is by no means silent. In some places it would seem to speak of death as though it were the end of man, as indeed it is of life, like the present. But again, it sets forth duties to God and man that cannot be measured by time, a law for the spirit, so searching, so high and holy as to seem incompatible with a mere finite earthly animal being; it speaks of relations to Deity, of awful accountabilities, that have no meaning, or that greatly collapse in their significance, if there be not for man another olam, another and greater state of being, either in itself, or to which it is preparatory. It never turns aside to explain any such seeming inconsistencies. Sublime in its reserve, in its types and shadows, in its mere hints of a post-mundane human destiny, as in its clearest announcements, this most suggestive Old Scripture goes on its majestic way, fearing no charge of contradiction, taking no pains to make any explicit provision against Sadducean cavils, and leaving the matter wholly to that spiritual discernment which the Saviour manifested (Matt. xxii. 23-33) against those who sought to entangle him with verbal and casuistical difficulties. One great truth of this kind stands prominently out. It is the idea of a judgment, somewhere, and at some time in the great æon of æons, the kingdom of God. This is especially the case in Koheleth, and all that is dark in the book is relieved by this one thought so firmly adhered to, so positively stated, so distinct in itself, or as a fact, yet so undefined in time, locality, and circumstance, as to make it extremely difficult for one who should demand attention to these in defending its consistency.—T. L.]

The mourners going about the streets, is a vivid description of the preparations for a great funeral, which are often made by his heirs for a mortally sick old man even before his decease. With this explanation, (agreeing substantially with HITZIG) it is not necessary, with HENGSTENBERG, to consider וְסָבְבוּ as relative future, and therefore to translate: "The mourners will soon go about." For the mourning customs of the ancient Hebrews consult Amos v. 16; Isa. xv. 33; Jer. ix. 16 ff.; Matt. ix. 23; xi. 17, etc.—Verses 6 and 7, following the description of hoary age, give that of his final end in death, and in such a way that the dissolution of the spiritual-bodily organism is first described in ver. 6 in a variety of figures, and then literally or in accordance with its inner nature. In syntactical relation the two verses run parallel with ver. 2, the construction there begun with עַד אֲשֶׁר לֹא "before," "being taken up again."—Or ever the silver cord be loosed—i. e., before the thread of life is ruptured. The thread of life is here designated as a silver cord, and not as a tent-cord (which keeps the tent from falling together, see Job iv. 21; Isa. xxxviii. 12), because the author imagines the living one, or rather his living organism, as a golden lamp hanging by a silver cord, as the sequel shows. Both figures, however, point, through the noble metals of which they speak, to human life as a valuable and noble possession; comp. the association of gold and silver in Prov. xxv. 11.—Read יֵרָחֵק* discessit longe recessit ("gives way"), not יֵרָתֵק ("is unbound"), as the K'ri has it; nor יִרְחַק as it stands in the text, nor יִנָּתֵק ["is torn asunder"] (PFANNKUCHE), nor יֵחָרֵק as HITZIG has it. These emendations are rendered unnecessary by the simplicity and perspicuity of the text.—Or the golden bowl be broken.—גֻּלָּה is literally equivalent to גַּל "fountain" (comp. Song of Solomon iv. 12 with Joshua xv. 19 and Judges i. 15); in Zach. iv. 3 it signifies a vessel for oil, or an oil lamp, and is so to be considered here. The human body is therefore considered as a vessel in which is contained, as in a lamp, the oil, the blood, which is the supporter of the soul or of life [comp. Lev. xvii. 14]. Like the precious oil of Zechariah, iv. 3, which is called "golden oil," so "is the blood the noble, precious fluid in the human organism;" and with reference to it as the condition of life and health, the organism itself is called גֻּלַּת הַזָּהָב "the golden bowl." HENGSTENBERG and HITZIG both maintain that this expression of the author here seems to be materially affected and modified by this passage in Zechariah iv. 2 ff.—And the pitcher broken at the fountain.—The pitcher [כַּד] is not identical with the golden bowl, and therefore a figurative designation of the whole body, but only of a special organ of it; of that one, namely, with which we draw air or breath, that is, nourish the body from the fountain of all life that surrounds it. The previous figure is now abandoned, or rather insensibly changed into one nearly allied to it; the burning flame of the golden lamp becomes the invisible inner flame of the process of respiration, whose physical organ is the lungs. Its destruction in death is figuratively described as the breaking (הִשָּׁבֵר) of the pitcher at the fountain, from which it had hitherto daily drawn water,—wherein there clearly appears an amplification of the expression as compared with the preceding form; comp. שבר in Isa. xlii. 3.—Or the wheel broken at the cistern.—Not a new figure, but only a more special illustration of the one just presented. The "wheel at the fountain" is the cistern wheel by which the bucket is raised or lowered, and cannot have a specific reference to any definite organ of the body, but symbolizes organic life itself in its continuous circle, just as "the wheel of birth" of James iii. 6 (τρόχος τῆς γενέσεως) based probably on this passage. The cistern (הַבּוֹר) is not materially different from the fountain (מַבּוּעַ) and likewise means the air surrounding man and affording the most indispensable of all conditions of life, namely, breath; it does not mean the whole world, as HENGSTENBERG maintains, or the grave, as some others think.—אֶל־הַבּוֹר is moreover the same as עַל הַבּוֹר "at the fountain," comp. 1 Sam. xx. 25; 2 Sam. ii. 9 ff. Observe also the passive נָרֹץ instead of the earlier active, תָּרֻץ; it means that the golden bowl "breaks," as it were, of its own accord, as soon as the silver cord that holds it is loosed; but the wheel "is broken," is destroyed at the same time with the whole machinery of life, by an act of violence operating from without.*—In older

*[The K'tib, or text as it stands in Niphal, יֵרָחֵק, is better, for it has something of a passive or rather deponent sense: "Thus parted"—"parts," intransitively, or "parts itself,"—elongabitur. It is the idea of giving way from stretching, or attenuation. The other various readings and renderings, as ZÖCKLER says, are useless.—T. L.]

*[ZÖCKLER's general comment here is judicious and safe. Attempts to be more particular are apt to mislead into fanciful error. And yet there remains the impression from the whole, and especially from the evident particularity in the first four verses, that certain parts or functions of the body are directly intended by the golden bowl, the bucket at the spring, and the wheel at the cistern. The ancients had more knowledge of the human anatomy than we give them credit for. The Egyptians must have learned much from their continual processes of embalming. It would appear also from HOMER's minute and varied descriptions of wounds, and especially in passages from ARISTOTLE and PLATO that show even a scientific knowledge of the human system. There is, for example, a passage of some length in the Timæus, extending from 70 B to 76 E, containing quite a full description of the more vital internal parts and their uses, with some things much resembling what we find here. In the assigning, too, of different spiritual powers and affections to different parts of the body, as though it were a kind of civil corporation, the author of the Timæus reminds us of JOHN BUNYAN and his town of Mansoul. Solomon's golden bowl, too, is suggested, when we read in the Timæus how the θεῖον σπέρμα, the "divine seed" of life was moulded into a round shape, and made the ἐγκέφαλος, or brain: and there are other things about the fluids and their περίοδοι, or circulations, that call up what is here said about the wheel and the fountain. Neither is there to be ridiculed and wholly rejected the idea which some have entertained that Solomon referred to the circulation of the blood. We need not suppose that he had anticipated HARVEY's great discovery; but the general idea that the human system had its period [or, to use ARISTOTLE's language before quoted, p. 46, that every organism was in the nature of a cycle, something going round and returning into itself] was a very early one. It came not so much from scientific or inductive observation, as from a sort of a priori thinking: so it must be; to constitute a living, or even an organic thing, there must be some such going round and round, to keep it from running out or perishing. It was this mode of thinking that showed itself in language, as in the Rabbinic גלגל תולדות and the τροχὸς γενεσεως, the "wheel of generation" of James iii. 6, to which ZÖCKLER refers.

As a lesson, however, to those who are inclined to be extravagant here, nothing can be more judicious than the remarks of MAIMONIDES in the Preface to his More Nevochim, where he tells those who would demand a minute explanation of every part of a mashal or parable—such, for example, as Prov. vii. 6–23—that "they will either miss the general thought, or get wearied in seeking particular illustrations of things that cannot be explained, and thus utterly fail in their vain attempt to get from the writer what perhaps never came into his mind."

On the whole, therefore, we cannot expect to get a much better interpretation of this passage than that early one given by JEROME: Funiculus autem argenti candidam hanc vitam, et spiramen quod nobis de cœlo tribuitur, ostendit; Phiala quoque aurea animam significat, quæ illuc recurrit unde descenderat, etc.: "The silver cord denotes the pure life and respiration [inspiration] which was given to us from heaven; the golden bowl also means the soul which returns whence it had descended; the breaking of the bucket at the fountain, and the shattering of the wheel at the cistern, are enigmatical metaphors of death; for as when the bucket which is worn out ceases to draw, and the wheel by which the waters are raised is broken, the flow of the water is in-commentators there are many arbitrary physiological and anatomical interpretations of the respective points of the description: MELANCHTHON sees in the silver cord the nerves and sinews, in the golden fountain the heart, and in the pitcher at the fountain, the great vein over the liver; PRAUN [Physico-Anatomica Analysis, Cap. XII., Ecclesiastes] thinks the silver cord the lacteal vessel of the breast, and WITSIUS the golden bowl the brain, whilst WEDEL makes it the heart, and HOTTINGER refers it to the gall. Since HARVEY'S discovery of the circulation of the blood, many have seen this pictured in the golden bowl as in the fountain (JABLONSKI, HANSEN, MICHAELIS, STARKE, SCHEUCHZER, etc.), and have mingled many strange things with it, e. g.: the pitcher is the liver (WITSIUS), or the lymph (WEDEL), or the stomach (HOTTINGER), or the chyle (PRAUN, SCHEUCHZER); the wheel signifies the kidneys, urinary passages, and bladder (WEDEL), or the peristaltic motions of the bowels (SCHEUCHZER), or the motion of the lungs (SIBEL, JABLONSKI). Look especially at STARKE on this passage, and also at the Exegetical monographs quoted on page 27.—Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was.—Namely, as dust; comp. Gen. iii. 19; Ps. civ. 29; Job xxxiv. 15, to which passages, especially the first named, Koheleth conforms in expression. For the form וְיָשֹׁב comp. EWALD, § 343 b.—And the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.—Namely, as the life-giving principle in the human organism, comp. Gen. ii. 7; Ps. civ. 30; Isa. xlii. 5; Jer. xxxviii. 16 This passage does not expressly affirm a personal immortality of the human soul, but it also does not deny it; for that the author is thinking of a pantheistic floating of the soul in the universal spirit, and that, "separated into individual existence, this particle of the Divine breath poured forth into the world by God will again be drawn to Him, and thus again unite with His breath, the soul of the world" (HITZIG)—all this, only rationalistic extravagance, can find in this passage. Koheleth's earlier testimonies rather show him to have thought of the return of the spirit to God as an entrance into the presence and eternal communion of God, and not as an absorption by God. And the arrival of the departed ones into the dark Scheol separating them from Divine light and life, so depicted in chap. ix., evidently appears to him only a provisional and intermediate condition which will finally be followed by an eternal existence with God after that "judgment" (chap. xi. 9). Compare VAIHINGER: "According to this the coming to God seems, in the conception of the Preacher, to be gradual, and the view in Ps. xlix. 6 to have been in his mind, viz.: that the good will be liberated from Scheol, and, after being acquitted in the judgment, will live blessed in God. Ps. xvii. 15, whilst the wicked will be cast back into Scheol after the judgment, and there eternally remain, Ps. xlix. 15;* Luke xvi. 22 ff." HENGSTENBERG says: "It is impossible that at the period of death the hitherto so marked difference between the just and the wicked will be suddenly effaced. The sharp earnestness with which the judgment of this world is every where announced, and especially in this book, decides against this. After all this, after the impressive emphasizing of the retributive justice of God, in which the entire book ends in ver. 14, the return of the soul to God can only be that spoken of by the Apostle in 2 Cor. v. 10; Rom. xiv. 10; Heb. ix. 27." It is noteworthy also that the Avesta, of all the religious documents of the ancient heathen the one which is most nearly allied to the Old Testament revelation, and most in harmony with it, contains an assertion quite similar to the one before us: "When the body dies here below, it mingles with the earth, but the soul returns to heaven." (Bundehesch, p. 384.) Something allied to this is found in some of the Greeks, e. g., Phokyllides, Ποίημα νουθετικόν, and in Euripides' Fragments [but more distinctly in the Drama of the Suppliants, 535: πνεῦμα μὲν πρὸς Αἰθερα (προς Δία) τὸ σῶμα δ' εἰς γῆν.—T. L.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

(With Homiletical Hints.)

This section properly contains the net result of the religious speculation of the Preacher; and in it the positive ground thoughts of the entire book arrive at their fullest development, and most striking and definite expression. This is externally seen in the style, hitherto at times, languid, of prosaic latitude, and unharmonious, but now rising to the loftiest strains, and clothed with the richest figurative adornments. Chap. x. had distinguished itself from the preceding by its greater wealth of figures and ingenious expressions; but now, from the very beginning of chap. xi., figure crowds on figure in a still more remarkable degree, until, in the introductory verses of the 12th chapter, or the third strophe of this section, the figurative ornament of speech rises to a fullness of the most profound, vivid, and surprising comparisons, which here and there almost give the impression of excessive and tumid accumulation. And yet the single figurative expressions need only correct illustration and fitting insertion into the combination of the whole, in order to stand justified against every suspicion of absence of taste or presence of extercepted,—so also when the silver cord (of life) has parted, the stream of vitality returns back to its fountain, and the man dies."

There must, however, be kept in mind the general parallel with the rich mansion of the voluptuary; and in this aspect the golden bowl is undoubtedly the lamp depending from the ceiling by the silver cord, as is described in the Æneid I. 726.

and which finally wears out and gives way. So the fountain and the cistern are the costly and curious water-machinery which such a mansion required for domestic drinking, and for irrigation. All is pictured as now in ruin, or going to ruin, like the curious circulating machinery of the human body with which it is compared. In regard to the reading of the text, we cannot do better than to retain the K'tib יִרָחֵק, and, pointed as it is, in the Niphal. From the sense of distance comes easily that of elongation (elongabitur), and thence of giving way, or parting. The words כַּבּוּעַ and כּוֹר although they differ etymologically, are probably chosen only for the sake of variety.—T. L.]

*[Compare iii. 21, and the marginal note, page 71, on the expression, "who knows the spirit of man that goeth up," etc.—T. L.]

cess, and to bring out into clearer light the object of the picture, viz., the many tribulations of age, the premonitions of approaching death, and finally the very process of life's dissolution itself; all this, too, more vividly than is elsewhere in Holy Writ effected, at least in so restricted a space. It shows an imperfect comprehension of this most interesting and original of all the descriptions in the book, that several commentators, especially UMBREIT and ELSTER, mistake the gradual progress of the described symptoms of dissolution from the commencement of senile feebleness till death, and, by means of an allegorical perversion, force on the details concerning old age as the forerunner of death (vers. 3–5), a direct reference to death itself. The usual conception of these verses, according to which they describe the body of man, together with its organs, as they grow old under the figure of a household sinking into decay and dissolution, is precisely that which justifies the praise ever given to the author as the representative of a wisdom endowed with unusual penetration in the sphere of theological and anthropological research. That characterizing of Koheleth originating with ORIGEN, and adopted by HIERONYMUS, giving to it the signification of a compendium of the physics of Solomon, (just as Proverbs contains the quintessence of his ethics, and the Song, the logic or dialectics of the wise king—comp. the General Introduction to the Solomonic writings) appears very especially justified by this passage; but this can only be the case when it is understood on the basis of the above developed, and only just comprehension of it as a description of the sad autumn and winter of the corporeal life of this world, and therewith as a foundation for the conception of human nature as a manifoldly significant image of the universe in general.

Beneficent, prosperous, industrious, and cheerful labors in life, afford the strongest security for lasting happiness, and to this fundamental thought of the section, the description in question holds the double relation that, on the one hand, it is to present and confirm the preceding admonition to a cheerful enjoyment of the pleasures of life's spring and summer, by reference to the contrast between these and the terrors of the autumn and winter of life, whilst, on the other hand, it is to present the basis for the farther admonition to that continual fear of God, which was necessarily to form the crowning termination and final goal of all the practical precepts of the author.—Comp. EWALD, p. 324: "The numerous tribulations of old age, and the mournful signs of approaching death, are described in the most striking figures, in order the more pressingly to admonish to a cheerful enjoyment of life at the proper period; but, at the same time, there appears most significantly the other truth by which the former receives its full light and correct limits, namely, that this very joy in life must not be blind and thoughtless, but thoughtful and conscious in remembrance of the eternal judgment over all things;—a truth which is indeed to be understood in every stern view of life, and which, therefore, has been only cursorily touched at an earlier period, (iii. 12, 17; viii. 12 ff.), but which is purposely alluded to here, in order to avoid any possible misunderstanding before the final close."—In view of the fearful earnestness of this concluding reference to death and eternity, every suspicion of Epicureanism, or of a frivolous, skeptical, and materialistic disposition, as a background for the preceding counsels to enjoy life, must disappear; and this the more so, since that which precedes this admonition to enjoyment of life testifies clearly enough of the deep seriousness and purity of the author's ethical views. For the admonition at the commencement of the 11th chap. (vers. 1-3) which reminds us of that in Ps. cxii. 9, counselling a profuse benevolence, mindful of no loss and of no gain, appears clearly as a true fruit of faith in a holy, just, and paternally loving God, but which could never spring from an Epicurean, skeptical, or fatalistic view of the world. The subsequent admonition to an unwearied fulfilment of our calling, unmindful of the future yet cautious and conscientious (vers. 4-6), proceeds not from a dull, melancholy resignation, or a loathing despair of life, but simply and alone from a childlike yielding to the will of God, and obedient subjection to His counsels as the only wise. Indeed, even in the reference to the sweetness of light, and the loveliness of life under the sun, with which (in ver. 7) he paves the way to that injunction to cheerful enjoyment, there is nothing in any way Epicurean, or that shows a one-sided, earthly, irreligious disposition. There is rather nothing expressed therein but the deep religious feeling of a pure joy in the beauty of the works of God, and an inwardly thankful appreciation of the proofs therein offered of His boundless goodness; a feeling that forms a contrast quite as opposite to all fatalism and gloomy atheistical materialism, as to every kind of moral levity, or thoughtless desire for enjoyment. See ELSTER, p. 125: "The deep feeling for the beauty and loveliness of life, which Koheleth expresses in this verse, shows us that it was not a bitter discontent based on a dull insensibility of the inward spirit; but his grief lies therein that with this deep feeling for beauty which human existence bears within itself, he painfully encounters, on the one hand, the fact that men are mutually cheating each other out of the real profit of life, whilst, on the other, he perceives that this existence is fleeting and transitory, and that he has foreclosed the hope of a future clearing up of human destiny because the view of a life after death seems to him utterly dark and uncertain (??).—The period which man is permitted to seize in the present, must now appear to him only so much the more important; and the only sure thing remaining to man must seem to him to be the holding fast of eternity by the highest activity in this particular period. Therefore to verse 8 there is again joined the admonition to pleasure, whose nature and character are clearly enough depicted in what precedes, as free from everything low and common, and rather as depending on the Most High and Eternal One."

Add to all this the fact, that the author marks the youthful vivacity and cheerfulness of life, which he recommends, expressly as a disposition to be tempered and purified by the thought of the retributive justice of God (ii. 9) and that there is ever present as the final aim of every earthly-human development (according to chap.

xii. 7), an eternal sojourn of the immortal soul with a holy and just God—a thought which Elster in the passage just quoted is clearly wrong in denying (see the exegetical illustrations to this passage),—adding this, and there results from it most conclusively that character of his ethical wisdom which is in conformity with revelation, and indeed directly belonging to revelation. We see especially the divinely inspired and incomparable nature of the religious truths of this section, in which the devout meditation of the author has reached its highest point, and after vanquishing doubt and hostility, combines its positive results into a chain of the purest ethical maxims, and the most profound physico-theological observations.

Homily on the Entire Section: The fear of God is the foundation of all true virtue, and all lasting joys.—Or: The fear of the Lord is the beginning and end of all wisdom.—Or: Live so in thy youth that old age brings to thee not terrors, but only the desire of relief from the yoke of this earthly life, and the joyful hope of an eternal existence with God.—Or: Use the morning of thy life profitably, that its evening may be calm and blissful; sow good seed in the spring-time of thy life, that thou mayest have a good harvest in the autumn.

HOMILETICAL HINTS ON SEPARATE PASSAGES.

Chap. xi. 1-3. Luther (ver. 1):—Be liberal whilst you can; use wealth in doing all the good in your power; for if you live long you shall receive a hundredfold.—Cartwright:—The universal instability of all things should excite you to munificence, whatever may happen in respect to you or the riches you may possess. Credit it for gain, whatever you may save from the flames and conflagration, as it were, by bestowing it upon the poor.—Starke (ver. 2):—In giving alms we are not to look too closely at the worthiness of the individuals. God permits His sun to rise on the just and the unjust!—Von Gerlach:—Collect not thy treasures by gathering in, but rather by giving out, by a denial of self! Ps. cxii. 9; 2 Cor. ix. 9.

Vers. 4-6. Hieronymus:—In season, out of season, the word of God is to be preached; and so without thought of clouds, or fear of winds, even in the midst of tempests, may we sow (the word). We are not to say this time is convenient, another unsuitable, since we know not what is the way of the Spirit that controls all.

Hansen:—In the distribution of his good deeds a man should not be too timorous; the left hand should not know what the right hand doeth.—Lange (ver. 5):—One cannot know how much good God may effect for the perfection of the faith, even among the dissolute poor!—Starke (ver. 6):—Do not delay thy amendment until an advanced age; begin early to fear God; thou wilt never repent of it. It is, however, better to repent even in age than to continue in one's sins. But he who fears God from youth up, will find his reward so much the more glorious, Rev. ii. 10.—Hengstenberg (ver. 6):—Be incessantly active. In seasons of destitution be so much the more active, because just then many things may miscarry. The more doubtful the result, so much the less should we lay our hands in our lap.

Vers. 7 and 8. Melanchthon:—Whilst God permits, reverently use His gifts; when He takes away, patiently submit; as Paul says, "Let the peace of God dwell in your hearts."—Cramer:—Because man has a desire for natural light, and shuns darkness, he should, therefore, practice the works of light, and shun those of darkness. It is a piece of ingratitude that we think more of our past evil days than of the good ones. We must thank God for both: Job ii. 10.—Hengstenberg:—However great are the sorrows of this life, however manifold its vanities, and sad its circumstances, it is nevertheless true that life is a good, and it is the office of the word of God to impress this truth when gloomy despondencey has gained the ascendency. Disgust of life is also sinful under the New Testament law. A pious spirit will find out the sunny side in this earthly existence, and rejoice in it with heartfelt gratitude.

Vers. 9 and 10. Luther:—When the heart is in a right state no joy will harm, provided only it be true joy, and not merely a corrupting mirth. Enjoy it, then, if there is any thing pleasant for the sight or hearing; provided you sin not against God.—Zeyss:—If thou wilt be preserved against the sadness of the world, thou must carefully guard thyself against its causes, i. e., the ruling sins and vices, and accustom thy heart to the genuine fear of God, Sirach i. 17.—Wolle:—He who would rejoice in the best bloom of his youth, must become acquainted with the Lord Jesus betimes, the fairest among the children of men, and make his heart a temple of the Holy Spirit, Sirach li. 18 ff.—Wohlfarth:—That your youth may gladly enjoy youth, that the tempter may not destroy its roses and cast it into endless woe, have God before your eyes, ye young men and maidens, and remember the serious words: Every one who forgets Him, He will summon to judgment.

Chap. xii. 1-5. Luther:—Holy Writ calls consolation and happiness light, and tribulation darkness, or night. For boys, for youth, for manhood, there is joy. After rain comes the beautiful sunshine, i. e., although at times there may be tribulation, yet joy and consolation follow. But age has no joy; the clouds return after the rain; one misfortune follows another.—Cramer (ver. 1):—Who would be devout must begin betimes; for it is unseemly to offer the dregs of life to God, after having given his blooming youth to the devil.—[Matthew Henry (ver. 5):—Man goes to "his long home." At death he goes from this world and all the employments and enjoyments of it. He has gone home; for here he was a stranger and a pilgrim. He has gone to his rest, to the place where he is to fix. He has gone to the house of his world, so some would render it; for this world is not his. He is gone to his house of eternity (Beth olamo). This should make us willing to die, that at death we go home; and why should we not long to go to our Father's house? Ver. 6. Death will dissolve the frame of nature, and take down the earthly house of this tabernacle. Then shall the silver cord by which the soul and body were wonderfully fastened together be loosed, that sacred knot untied, and those old friends be forced to part. Then shall the golden bowl which held for us the waters of life be broken; then shall the pitcher with which we used to fetch up water, for the constant support of life, and the repair of its decays, be broken, even at the fountain; so that it can fetch up no more; and the wheel, all those organs that serve for the collecting and distributing of nourishment, shall be shattered, and disabled to do their office any more. The body has become like a watch when the spring has broken; the motion of all the wheels is stopped; they all stand still; the machine is taken to pieces; the heart beats no more, nor does the blood circulate.

Ver. 7:—So death resolves us into our first principles. Man is a ray of heaven united to a clod of earth; at death these are separated, and each goes to the place whence it came.—T. L.]

Vers. 6 and 7. LUTHER:—It is not defined where the spirit goes, but only that it returns to God from whom it came. For as we are ignorant of the source whence God made the spirit, so also we know not whither (or to what) it returns. Comp. HENGSTENBERG: The view that the individual soul returns to God, is supported by the fact that it had its origin immediately from God. According to this passage, creationism must be true, although it is a truth which, for certain significant reasons that favor traducianism, can only be regarded as a partial, or one-sided one. It is important that the two apparently opposing views should be reconciled by something common to both.

ZÖCKLER:—Not a few older theologians have endeavored to interpret this passage (xii. 7) in the interest of a one-sided creationism; e. g., HIERONYMUS, who says: "They are to be contemned who hold that souls are sown with bodies, and are born, not from God, but from the bodies of the parents. But since the flesh returns to earth, and the spirit to God who gave it, it is clear that God, not man, is the parent of souls. To this the traducianist replies: Koheleth treats, in this verse, solely of the creation of the first man (or the first humanity) * and of his relation to God (and so, at least by intimation, LUTHER on this passage, and CARTWRIGHT in Hengstenberg, p. 258); but they are not able thereby to remove the partial creationistic sense of the passage. Compare HENGSTENBERG and VAIHINGER.

WOLLE:—Unblessed is the old age and death of those who grow old in the service of sin. On the contrary, a conscience kept pure from youth up, lightens and sweetens both the toils of age and the bitterness of death, Job xxvii. 6.—BERLEB. BIBLE:—Souls come from eternity into the world as to a stage. There they manifest their persons (their masks) their affections, and their passions, whatever is in them of good or bad. When they have, as it were, sufficiently performed their parts, they again disappear, and lay off the persons that they have represented, and stand, naked as they are, before the divine tribunal. Universal as is the decree that all men are to return to God, there is, nevertheless, a great difference in them. The most return to him as to their offended Lord; but some as to the All-merciful, their friend and father. Because then this coming to God is certain and unavoidable, it should be our most necessary care that we are every moment concerned as to how we may come to Him rightly.—VAIHINGER:—The divine judgment of the life and conduct of men, as mentioned in chap. xi. 9, is only rendered possible by the personal return of the spirit to God. Therefore in youth must we think of our Creator, and live in His fear (iii. 14; v. 7); for the spirit does not become dust with the body; it returns not to the universal force of nature, but because it is from God it returns to God, to be judged by Him, i. e., either to be blessed or condemned.

* [There is a sense in which creationism may be held in respect to the animal, and even the vegetable life. It is not irrational, it is not unscriptural, to suppose that in every true genesis there is a going on of the old unspent creative power, or word acting in a plane above the ordinary mechanical and chemical laws which God has given to nature. In a still higher sense may this be held of the human generation,—of the individual as well as of the first generic man (see Ps. cxxxix. 13–16; Jer. i. 4). And yet such a view is consistent with a doctrine of traducianism that connects every man with the first man, not by an arbitrary forensic decree, or appointment from without, but by a vital union, a psychological continuance of the same being, however great the mystery it may involve. There is a school of theologians who say that "in some way," by God's appointment, we are so connected with Adam that we sin "in consequence" of his sin, and suffer "in consequence" of his sin, though each succeeding human soul is born separate and pure. There is another school that brands this with heresy, or treats it as evasive, and claims for itself a higher orthodoxy on account of the use of the words "federal headship," "imputation," etc., whilst they equally affirm that Adam's posterity are not morally guilty in respect to the first sin. It is a representative, a forensic guilt, though involving the most tremendous consequences. Any essential difference between these is not easily discerned. Both make it a matter of outward and arbitrary institution, as long as there is denied any such psychological and ontological connection between us and the first man as grounds this "federal headship" and "imputation," as well as this "certain consequence as a fact," on a remoter and deeper union. The first class of terms are very precious ones, and sustained by the figures and analogies of Scripture, but their meaning collapses, or becomes arbitrary, when we put nothing beyond them as a fact, however inexplicable that fact may be. Holding to such deeper union, we become, indeed, involved in a metaphysical mystery, but we get free from the moral mystery, which is a much more important thing.—T. L.]

EPILOGUE.

Review of the whole, and Commendatory Recapitulation of the truths therein contained.

CHAP. XII. 8–14.

1. With reference to the personal worth of the author.

(VERS. 8–11).

8 9 Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher; all is vanity. And moreover, because the Preacher was wise, he still taught the people knowledge: yea, he gave good heed,
10 and sought out, and set in order many proverbs. The Preacher sought to find out acceptable words: and that which was written, was upright, even words of truth.
11 The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails fastened by the masters of assemblies, which are given from one shepherd.

2. With reference to the serious and weighty character of his teachings.

(VERS. 12–14).

12 And further, by these, my son, be admonished: of making many books there is 13 no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh. Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole 14 duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil.

Ver. 9.—אִזֵּן. The primary sense of this root must be the ear, or hearing; since it is easier to understand how the sense of weighing (as it is in the Arabic וזן) came from that, than vice versa. The latter sense is either by a very natural figure, or from the resemblance of a balance with its two ears, as they may be called. Its intensive piel sense here may denote listening attentively, as a prelude to judging, or the act of the mind itself.

[Ver. 11.—בַּעֲלֵי אֲסֻפּוֹת would be, according to the common usage, "masters of collections," or of gatherings. בַּעַל, however, sometimes only very slightly modifies the meaning of the following word, and there is nothing in the way of its having the objective sense, like other similar auxiliary words: "objects of collections," rather than "makers of collections,"—the things gathered rather than the gatherers. So HITZIG views it, who has rendered it simply gesammelten, that is, collectanea or collections. In this way alone does it make a true parallel with the "words of the wise" in the previous number: "their gathered sentences," as we have rendered it in the Metrical Version.—T. L.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This concluding discourse opens purposely with that sentence which opened the book (1, 2), namely, with a lamentation over the vanity of all earthly things. This exclamation cannot be considered as a conclusion to what precedes, because the very words that immediately precede (ver. 7) had opened the view to something that is not הֶבֶל, but the vanquishing of all הֲבָלִים, and because, especially in the last section of the fourth discourse, the reference to the vanity of the world, or the negative side of the truths taught by the author, had fallen much behind the positive ideas of zeal in vocation, cheerful joy of life, and fear of God (as not vanities, but as virtue conquering vanity). Unlike the division followed by DE WETTE, KOSTER, ROSENMUELLER, KNOBEL, EWALD, HITZIG, ELSTER, etc., verse 8 is to be connected with what follows, in accordance with most of the older commentators (also with DATHE, UMBREIT, VAIHINGER, HENGSTENBERG, HAHN, etc.) and is to be considered as an introductory formula * of the Epilogue, purposely conforming to the beginning of the whole. This view is also strengthened by the circumstance that the וְ at the commencement of the

* [The correctness of this would depend entirely upon the view we take of the preceding description. If it is the old age of the sensualist, the "aged sinner," as WATTS calls him, and as we have maintained in the note preceding the exegetical remarks on the section,—then this exclamation: Oh, vanity! all vanity! would be a very appropriate close. At the beginning of this scholium it would seem out of place under any circumstances, except, perhaps, as an imitation of the beginning of the book, for which there can be assigned no reason in any connection it has with what follows, whether regarded as all appended by a scholiast, or, which is the most probable view, that vers. 9, 10 are an inserted prose note by some other hand, intended to call special attention to the weighty concluding words that follow from the original author. These are clearly poetry, and as rhythmical as any ninth verse presents this, not as an introductory verse, but as the continuation of something already begun, whilst on the contrary the expression הֲבֵל הֲבָלִים, ver. 8, according to the analogy of chap. i. 2, is clearly used as an introductory formula. The object of this formula at the opening of the epilogue is again to present to the reader the negative summation of the observations and experience of the author, the fact of the vanity and perishability of all earthly things in order subsequently to establish the correctness of this result by a double testimony:—1. By vindication of the moral weight of the personality of the author as a genuinely wise man and teacher of wisdom (vers. 9-11); 2. by referring to the very serious and important character of the precepts laid down by him (vers. 12-14). These two divisions are characterized by equal length and analogous construction* (i. e., that they both begin with וְיֹתֵר "and moreover") as skilfully planned strophes or executions of the theme contained in ver. 8, and not as two mere postscripts of the author added as by chance (HITZIG); whilst in the latter the positive result of the religious and moral observations of the Preacher appears again in the most significant and precise form possible (ver. 13), strengthened, too, by an addition (ver. 14) which presents most clearly the correct intermediation of the positive with the negative result in ver. 8, and thus affords the only true solution of the great enigma from which chap. i. 2 had proceeded. This solution consists simply in pointing him who is discontented and anxious about the vanity and unhappiness of this life, to the great day of universal reckoning, and in the inculcation of the duty of deferential obedience to a holy and just God,—a duty from which no one can escape with impunity. As this epilogue is in reality the first to offer the key to the correct understanding of the whole, (for the sum of the previously developed precepts of wisdom, is given neither so clearly nor impressively in chap. xi. 1–12, 7, as is the case here) we clearly perceive the untenability of that hypercritical view (V. D. PALM, DÖDERLEIN, BERTHOLD, KNOBEL, UMBREIT, and, to a certain extent, also, of HERZFELD) which denies the authenticity of these closing verses (from ver. 9). For a special refutation of their arguments comp. the Int. § 8, Obs.

2. First strophe. Vers. 8–11. The negative result of the book, attested in its truth and importance by reference to the personal worth of the author as a genuine teacher of wisdom. For verse 8 see partly the previous paragraph (No. 1), and partly the exegetical illustrations to chaps. 1 and 2. For the name קֹהֶלֶת (here without the article) see the Intr., § 1. Ver. 9. And moreover because the Preacher was wise. וְיֹתֵר (used substantively): "and the remainder" (comp. 1 Sam. xv. 15), is here, and in verse 12, clearly equivalent to: "and there remains," namely, "to say." The indirect construction follows here, introduced by שֶׁ (comp. the Lat. restat, ut, etc.), whilst in ver. 12 we find the direct construction (comp. the Lat. Quod restat, or Ceterum). GESENIUS, WINER, KNOBEL, VAIHINGER, etc., translate וְיֹתֵר שֶׁהָיָה "and moreover, because," and therefore accept this clause as preliminary, letting the subsequent one commence with עוֹד (LUTHER does the same: "This same Preacher was not only wise," etc.; and so, in sense, the Vulgate: "Cumque esset sapientissimus Ecclesiastes"). But this is opposed partly by the analogy of the commencement, v. 12, and partly by the circumstance that the עוֹד alone could scarcely introduce the secondary clause. HENGST. correctly remarks concerning חָכָם: "A wise man, not in the sense of the world, but of the kingdom of God, not from one's self, but from God (comp. ver. 11), so that this passage is not in contradiction with Prov. xxvii. 2: 'Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth; a stranger, and not thine own lips.' And nevertheless, Solomon could hardly have spoken thus of himself without incurring the censure of self-praise. And even another, who had written this with reference to him, would, in reality, have expressed something insipid and inappropriate, in case he really had the historic Solomon in his eye. For which reason the fictitious character of Koheleth, or his merely ideal identity with Solomon is quite apparent.—He still taught the people knowledge.—For עוֹד at the beginning of a sentence, comp. Gen. xix. 12; Micah vi. 10; Job xxiv. 20.—Yea, he gave good heed, and sought out, and set in order many proverbs.—אִזֵּן "to consider, to weigh," the root of מֹאזְנַיִם "balances." This verb in conjunction with the following וְחִקֵּר shows the means whereby he "set in order" (תִּקֵּן comp. chap. i. 15; vii. 13), many proverbs. This product was the result of careful investigation and reflection—a relation of the three verbs to one another, which is clearly indicated by the absence of the copula before the third: תִּקֵּן; comp. Gen. xlviii. 14; 1 Kings xiii. 18; EWALD, § 338 c.—By the "many proverbs" (הַרְבֵּה as in v. 7; xi. 8), the author evidently does not mean those mentioned in 1 Kings v. 12, but rather those sayings of Solomon that are contained in the Book of Proverbs; for he imitates mainly these latter in his own contained in this book.—Ver. 10. The Preacher sought to find out acceptable words.—דִּבְרֵי־חֵפֶץ, pleasant, agreeable words (λόγον χαριτος, Luke iv. 23), comp. אַבְנֵי חֵפֶץ Isa. liv. 12. Here are naturally meant thing in the book. Such inserted scholia should create no more difficulty than their evident appearance in Genesis, and elsewhere in the Pentateuch. The remark that follows, about the force of the conjunction ו has no weight whatever. It is so often used as a mere transition particle; and the idea of any logical, or even rhetorical, connection between the exclamation and the plain prosaic annotation that follows is absurd.—T. L.]

*[It should be said, rather, that the two divisions are made by the 9 and 10, on the one hand, and all that follows on the other. The fact that ver. 12 begins with וְיֹתֵר is of no importance in this respect. But that which has a decided bearing on the division is overlooked, namely, that the first (9 and 10) is the plainest prose, whilst the second (beginning with the 11th) most clearly returns to the poetical both in thought and diction.—a fact which shows that the first belongs to a scholiast, the second to the main and original author of the book. See the Metrical Version.—T. L.]

words acceptable not to the great mass, but to serious minds, heavenly inclined, and seeking wisdom; words of honeyed sweetness in the sense of Ps. xix. 11, verba quæ, jure meritoque desiderari et placere debent, tamquam divinæ virtutis et certitudinis (S. SCHMIDT). The expression חֵפֶץ can scarcely relate to mere acceptability and adornment of the form of speech (as asserted by HITZIG and ELSTER).—And that which was written was upright, even words of truth. The passive participle וְכָתוּב expresses that which was written by the author in consequence of seeking after acceptable words; hence HERZFELD, and after him, HENGSTENBERG and ELSTER, are correct: "and thus then was written what was correct;" EWALD and VAIHINGER, on the contrary, render erroneously: "but honest words were written," which adversative rendering of the conjunction is decidedly injurious to the sense and opposed to the text. HITZIG reads וְכָתוֹב the infinitive absolute: "to find (לִמְצֹא) and write;" but this change is quite as unnecessary as the adverbial rendering of יֹשֶׁר in the sense of "correct, honest," which latter rendering is also found in LUTHER, KNOBEL, VAIHINGER, ELSTER, etc. It is מֵישָׁרִים that expresses this adverbial sense every where else (Song of Solomon i. 4; vii. 10; Prov. xxiii. 31; Ps. lviii. 1). יֹשֶׁר is, on the contrary, here, as every where, a substantive, meaning straightforwardness, uprightness; and that in which this uprightness consists is expressed by the words in apposition, דִּבְרֵי אֱמֶת—"words of truth," i. e., in true teaching, acceptable to God, and therefore bringing blessings; teachings of the genuine "hea venly wisdom." Comp. Prov. viii. 6–10; James iii. 17.—Ver. 11. The words of the wise are as goads.—The author, by bringing "the words of truth" under the general category of "words of the wise" (i. e., of those ethical precepts as they issue from the circles of the Chakamim, to which he himself belongs according to ver. 9), lends to them so much the more weighty significance and authority; for all that can be said in praise of the words of the Chakamim in general must now especially avail also of his proverbs and discourses. Hence the phrase דִּבְרֵי חֲכָמִים would be more fittingly rendered by: "Such words of wise men" (comp. HITZIG). HENGSTENBERG takes too narrow, or, if we will, too broad a view of the idea of "wise men," when he, in connection with older authors, as LUTHER, RAMBACH, STARKE, etc., sees therein only the inspired writers of the O. T., or the authors of the Canonical Books; according to which this verse would contain a literal and direct self-canonization. But this is opposed by the fact that חכמים elsewhere always means the authors of the characteristic Proverbial wisdom, or Chokmah, the teachings of the Solomonic and post-Solomonic era, which is to be clearly distinguished from the prophetic and lyrico-poetical [Psalmistic] literature (see 1 Kings iv. 30 f.; Prov. i. 6; xxii. 17; Jer. xviii. 18; and comp. §3 of the General Intr. to the Solomonic literature, Vol. XII., p. 8 f.), so that Moses, Joshua, Samuel, David, etc., could not possibly have been reckoned in this category. This is quite apart from the fact that such a self-canonization expressed in the manner aforesaid, would have been neither especially appropriate nor sufficiently clear. כַּדָּרְבֹנוֹת, "like goads," i. e., endowed with stinging, correctly aiming, and deeply penetrating effect, "verba, quæ aculeorum instar alte descendunt in pectora hominum, iisque manent infixa" (GESENIUS; comp. EWALD, HITZIG, HENGSTENBERG and ELSTER). It is usually regarded as "ox-goads" (Septuagint, ὡς τὰ βούκεντρα; Targ., Talm., Rabb., and most of the moderns). But דָּרְבָן or דָּרְבֹן (1 Sam. xiii. 21), neither means specially, according to its etymology, a goad to drive cattle, nor does the parallel "as nails" lead exactly to this special meaning, to which the plural form of the expression would not be favorable. Neither is it the case that all the words of the wise, nor especially all the proverbs of this book, are of a goading, that is, an exhortatory, nature, as HITZIG very correctly observes. Therefore we must stop at the simple meaning of "goads," and interpret this to signify the penetrating brevity, the inciting and searching influence of these precepts of wisdom of Koheleth and other wise men.—And as nails fastened by the masters of assemblies.—As the "fastened nails" doubtless form a synonym to the "goads," so the masters of assemblies, literally "the colleagues of the assembly" [בַּעֲלֵי אֲסֻפּוֹת comp. chap. x. 11, 20; Prov. i. 17; Isa. xli. 15] can only be another expression for those "words of the wise." We are therein to understand collected maxims of wisdom, united into one assembly or collection, and not merely well connected proverbs, as EWALD and ELSTER would have it; for the verb אסף does not refer to the excellence and perfection of the collection; neither does the figure of the nails, which, at most, leads to the idea of juncture, and not to that of a specially beautiful and harmonious order. Highly unfitting also is the interpretation of בַּעֲלֵי אֲסֻפּוֹת as "masters of assemblies" (LUTHER), i. e., partakers in learned assemblies [GESENIUS] or principals of learned schools, teachers of wisdom [VAIHINGER, etc.], or even authors of the individual books of the sacred national library, or authors of the separate books of the Old Testament Canon [HENGSTENBERG]. This personal signification of the expression is forbidden once for all by the parallelism with the "words of wisdom" in the first clause.—Which are given from one shepherd.—That is, in so far as the "words of the wise" in the preceding book are united, they proceed from one author, who was not only a wise man, but a "shepherd" in the bargain, i. e., a wise teacher, the leader of a congregation, an elder of the synagogue. For this sense of "shepherd" as chief of a school, or a priestly teacher, comp. Jer. ii. 8; iii. 15; x. 21; xxiii. 4. The oneness of the authorship is here thus pointedly expressed by way of contrast to the many "wise men" in the first clause. To refer the expression to God [HIERON., GEIER, MICHAELIS, STARKE, HENGSTENBERG, HERZFELD, KNOBEL, etc.], is quite as arbitrary as a reference to Moses [Targ.], to the historic Solomon [JABLONSKI, etc.], to Zerubbabel [GROTIUS], or as the emendation כְּרֹעֶה for מֵרֹעֶה by virtue of which HITZIG translates: "which are given united as a pasture" [reading נִתְּנוּ instead of נִתְּנוּ]

8. Second strophe. Ver. 12–14. The positive result of the book as a self-speaking testimony for the truth, worth, and weight of its contents.—And further, by these, my son, be admonished.—The word מֵהֵמָּה is closely but improperly connected by the Masoretic accentuation with וְיֹתֵר (it can as well be absolute as in ver. 9 above): it refers to the "words of the wise given by one shepherd," contained in ver. 11, and thus, in short, to the maxims of this book [not of the entire Old Testament Canon, as HENGSTENBERG thinks]. "From them" [comp. Gen. ix. 11; Isa. xxviii. 7], the reader, the "son" of the wise teacher, is to be admonished. For בְּנִי "my son," which is equivalent to my scholar; compare Prov. i. 8; x. 15; ii. 1, etc., and for הִזָּהֵר "be admonished," "accept wisdom," chap iv. 13, preceding.—Of making many books there is no end.—That is, beware of the unfruitful, even dangerous, wisdom which others [partly in Israel, partly among the heathen, e. g., Egyptians, Persians, Greeks, etc.—Comp. Intr., § 3, Obs] endeavor to spread and inculcate in numberless writings * It is not worldly literature. in general, in contrast to the spiritual literature of Divinely inspired writings, against which the author utters a warning (HENGSTENBERG), but the useless and deceitful literature of others which he contrasts with that genuine wisdom taught by him. The countless elaborations of false philosophers [Col. ii. 8], as they already then in the bloom of Hellenistic sophistry were beginning to fill the world, are presented to his readers by way of warning, as a foul and turbid flood of perverted and ruinous opinions, by which they ought not to permit themselves to be carried away. HERZFELD takes the infinitive עֲשׂוֹת as a genitive dependent on אֵין קֵץ, and renders אֵין in a conditional sense, "to making many books there would be no end." HITZIG opposes this rendering, but improperly takes אֵין קֵץ as a mere adverbial modifier to הַרְבֵּה instead of the מְאֹד elsewhere customary in such connection, and hence translates "the making of very many books," requiring much exertion of the mind (לַהַג) "is weariness of the body." Thereby Koheleth would give his readers to understand that he might have written for them whole books filled with maxims of wisdom (comp. John xxi. 25), but would rather not do this, as being useless and fatiguing. But the term "infinitely many" would then involve a very strong hyperbole; and the equality and rhythmical harmony of the construction would be too much destroyed by such an affirmation of two subjects for the predicate יְגִעַת בָּשָׂר.—And much study; Namely, the study of many books, much reading (ABEN EZRA, EWALD, VAIHINGER, ELSTER, etc.) not the writing of books (HITZIG), nor the thirst after knowledge (HENGSTENBERG), nor preaching (LUTHER, HAHN, etc.),—these are all renderings at variance with the simple and clear sense of לַהַג הַרְבֵּה.—Is a weariness of the flesh.—VAIHINGER correctly says, "the passion for reading, which weakens mind and body, whilst fruitful reflection strengthens both. Such a morbid desire corresponds entirely with the later Jewish eras.* See above, chap. i. 18.—Ver. 13. Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: In contrast, that is, to this useless making of many books and much reading. סוֹף, "the end" (comp. iii. 11; vii. 2) does not literally signify the sum of all that has been previously said, but the limit which the author wishes just now to set to his discourse, the practical conclusion by which we are to abide. Therein we see that it is not the total and all-comprehending result of his observations and teachings, but only the positive or practical side of this result (in contrast to the negative one expressed in ver. 8) that he will now express in the following maxim; see above No. 1.—דָּבָר points, even without an article, to the precise discourse of this book, and therefore to the entirety of דִּבְרֵי קֹהֶלֶת (comp. i. 1, and for דָּבָר in this collective sense, see 1 Sam. iii. 17; Joshua xxi. 43, etc.) הַכֹּל is really in apposition with דָּבָר, consequently, when strictly taken is to be translated, "the end of the discourse,—of the whole," and not, "the end of the whole discourse." And therewith it is indeed intimated that in the end of the discourse the whole is included, or that the final thought is the ground thought (or at least one principal thought); comp. HENGSTENBERG and VAIHINGER. Observe also that by the mutual נִשְׁמָע "let us hear," the author subjects himself to the absolute commandment of fearing God and obeying Him.—Fear God, and keep His commandments. Literally, "God fear"—the object of fear emphatically placed before, as in Chap. v. 7.—For this is the whole duty of man. There is an ellipsis of the verb in the original, for which comp. chap. ii. 12; Jer. xxiii. 5; xxvi. 9. The correctness of our rendering, which is the same as Luther's ("for that belongs to all men") is confirmed by verse 14, where we are informed of a divine judgment of all men regarding their works. The Vulgate, EWALD, HERZFELD, and ELSTER say, "for that is the whole man," which is as much as saying, "thereon rests his entire fate." But this sense would be very obscurely expressed; and כָּל־הָאָדָם, moreover, never means "the whole man," but "every man," "all men.* Ver. 14.—For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing. (ZÖCKLER renders: "Judgment upon every hidden thing"). This direct connection of עַל כָּל־נֶעְלָם with the preceding בְּמִשְׁפָּט is sustained by the construction of the verb שָׁפַט in Niphal with עַל, Jer. ii. 35, as well as by the frequent use of עַל in the sense of "on account," "concerning." The view of HITZIG that עַל here stands for לְ, the particle of relation, is too artificial, as is that of VAIHINGER and HAHN, that עַל=עִם "together with every secret thing." The natural meaning is, the judgment in the next world, as also in ch. xi. 9, not simply that which is executed in the ordinary development of this world. This view is supported also by the addition, "every secret thing," compared with Rom. ii. 16; 1 Cor. iv. 5, as well as by the subsequent, "whether it be good, or whether it be evil," compared with 2 Cor. v. 10; John v. 29, etc. Still the present judgment, executed in the history of the world, may come into consideration, here as well as in chap. xi. 9, and Psalm xc. 8. (Comp. John iii. 17 ff.; Eph. v. 13, etc.).

*[See the remarks in Appendix to Introduction. p. 30, on סְפָרִים as referring here to this very book of Koheleth itself.—the plural either denoting chapters, or parts of one treatise, as the term is used by Greek and Latin writers, or being equivalent to πολλὰ γράμματα, or multæ literæ, "much writing." It may be rendered, therefore, collectively, or in the singular: "in making a great book there is no end." It is an endless. a useless, labor. What is already written is enough; "therefore let us hear," etc.—T. L.]

*[There is no maintaining this unless the date of Koheleth is brought down to a period nearly, if not quite, cotemporaneous with the Christian era. Even then, there was no such establishment of Jewish schools, or spread of Jewish books, as would render credible the existence among them of such a Lesewuth, or Lesesucht ("passion for reading," "morbid desire for reading") as is here spoken of by ZÖCKLER and HITZIG. Such an idea is not hinted at in the New Testament. All this shows the difficulty of finding any place for this book of Koheleth between the time of Solomon and that of Christ. The application of such a remark to the times of Malachi would be utterly absurd.—T. L.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

(With Homiletical Hints).

The ground thought of this closing section, as already developed in No. 1 of the exegetical illustrations, is about as follows: The speech of the truly wise man infallibly proves itself to be such by its inner strength and truth; its effect, penetrating, like goads and nails, deeply into the heart, sharpening the dull conscience, mightily summoning the whole man to the fear of God and obedience to His sacred commandments, testifies in the most direct manner to its harmony with the word of God,—yes, even to its divine origin and character. It is the voice of eternity in time, of the imperishable, ever-living truth, rescuing us from sin and death in the midst of the vanity of this world. Thus is it to be understood when the preacher of the genuine truth proclaims to his hearers these two great truths of revelation: "All is vanity," and, "Fear God and keep His commandments," and thus it guides them to a correct knowledge of sin as well as of the way of salvation,—of the law as of the gospel.

In accordance with this, the theme for a succinct homiletical treatment of the section, would be about the following: Of the inward power and truth of the divine word, as is shown in the preaching of the law and gospel (of repentance and faith) as the immutably connected, and fundamental elements of divine revelation.—Or, the knowledge of the vanity of all earthly things as the foundation for the knowledge and inheritance of heavenly glory.—Or: Of the wholesomeness of the wounds inflicted by the goads of the divine word.

*[כָּל, in the construct. state, rather means, "the whole of man." The other expression, "every man," might have the construct. form, but כֹּל, the absolute, with or without the article, would be the best adapted to it.—T. L.]

HOMILETICAL HINTS TO SEPARATE PASSAGES.

Vers. 9 and 10. CRAMER:—It is not enough that a teacher be simply learned unto himself; it is his duty to serve others with the talent that God has given him, and not to bury it.—STARKE:—He alone is skilful in leading others into the way of truth who himself has been a pupil of truth, who has been instructed in the school of Jesus. GEIER (ver. 10):—Every one who speaks or writes should endeavor with all zeal to present nothing but what is just, true, lovely, and edifying, Phil. iv. 8; 1 Peter iv. 11.

Vers. 11 and 12. BRENZ:—Unless you lay the foundation of faith in the word of God, you will be the sport of every wind; much reading, frequent hearing of discourses, will bring more of error, disquietude, and perturbation, than of genuine fruit.—LUTHER:—He exhorts us not to be led away by various and strange teachings It is as if he had said: You have an excellent teacher; beware of new teachers; for the words of this teacher are goads and spears. Such also were David's and the prophets'. But the bungler's words are like foam on the water.—GEIER:—In sermons and other edifying discourses, we must not speak words of human wisdom, or fables and idle prattle, but the words of the holy men of God, which are, themselves, the words of the living God; godly preaching is proof of the spirit and the power, 1 Cor. ii. 4.—HENGSTENBERG:—We have here a rule for the demeanor of hearers towards the sermon; they are not to be annoyed if its goad penetrates them.

Vers. 13 and 14. MELANCHTHON:—He sets forth a final rule which ought to be the guide of all counsels and actions: Look to God and His teaching; depart not from it, and be assured that he who thus departs rushes, without doubt, into darkness, into the snares of the devil, and into the direst punishments. Refer all counsels and all actions to this end, namely, obedience to God. STARKE:—A sure sign of genuine fear of God, is to be zealous in keeping the commandments of God by the grace of the Holy Ghost.—SIBEL:—Since God has given to us the spirit, let us keep pure and sound this noble deposit, that we may thus return it to the Giver and the Creator. So good and faithful men are wont to guard a deposit committed to their care (1 Tim. vi. 20). On the health of the soul depends the health of the body, and of the whole man. The soul saved we lose nothing; when that is lost all perishes. ZEYSS:—The thought of the day of judgment, is a salutary medicine against false security (Sirach vii. 40), and a sweet promise of the rewards of mercy in eternal life. WOLLE:—Because God is infinitely just, He will neither let hidden evil be unpunished, nor hidden good be unrewarded. To Him therefore be all the glory forevermore.

AMEN.

METRICAL VERSION OF KOHELETH.

BY THE AMERICAN EDITOR.

INTRODUCTION.

POETICAL CHARACTER OF THE BOOK.

[STUART asserts that Koheleth is not poetry. HITZIG treats it very much in the same way, as essentially a formal prose ethical treatise. It is not too much to say that this overlooking the true poetical character and spirit of the composition, is, with both these commentators, the cause of much frigid exegesis, and false rhetorical division. There is, however, high authority for the other view [see LOWTH's Heb. Poetry, p. 205, 411, Eichhorn Einleitung, Vol. V., 250, 228, and JAHN's Introduction to the Old Testament]. EWALD is decided for its poetical character, and ably maintains it. "A genuine poetic inspiration," he says, "breathes through it all" [see ZÖCKLER's Introduction, § 2, Remark 3, p. 10]. He, however, regards some parts as prose (such as the little episode ix. 13-16), or as mere historical narrative, which seem to present the poetic aspect, both in the thought and in the measured diction. Thus the allusion to the "poor wise man who saved the city" is as rhythmical in its parallelism (when closely examined) as any other parts, whilst it is not only illustrative of what is in immediate proximity, but is also itself of the poetic cast in the manner of its conception. Although ZÖCKLER thus refers to EWALD, his own interpretation seems affected too much by the prosaic idea of a formal didactic treatise, with its regular logical divisions. We have deemed this question entitled to a fuller argument here, because it seems so intimately connected with a right view of the book, both as a whole and in the explanation of its parts. The whole matter, however, lies open to every intelligent reader. The question is to be decided by the outward form as it appears in the original, and by the peculiar internal arrangement of the thought in its parallelistic relations. This latter is the special outward mark of Hebrew poetry. Though there may not be anything like iambics or dactyls discoverable, even in the Hebrew, yet every reader of the common English Version feels, at once, that he is coming into a new style of diction, as well as of thought and emotion, when, in Gen. iv. 23 he finds the plain flow of narrative suddenly changed by a new, and evidently measured, arrangement, calling attention to a peculiar subjective state in the writer or utterer, and putting the reader immediately en rapport with it:

> Adah and Zillah, hear my voice;
> Ye wives of Lamech, listen to my speech.

So is it also when he finds the inartificial, yet highly eloquent prose narrative of Exodus xiv., and chapters preceding, all at once interrupted by a strain commencing thus—

> I will sing unto Jahveh, for glory! glorious!
> Horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea;

or when, after the plainest historical style in Numbers xxiv., and previously, he is startled by such music of thought and language as this—

> I shall see Him, but not now;
> I shall behold Him, but not nigh;
> There shall come a star out of Jacob;
> A sceptre shall arise out of Israel.

This is not so striking in Koheleth; in some places it is barely discoverable; but such parallelism of thought and diction is really there, to a greater or less extent, and, in many parts, as clearly discernible as in Job or the Psalms; more clearly than in much of Isaiah. Thus, for example, chap. x. 20—

> Not even in thy thought revile the king;
> Nor in thy chamber dare to curse the rich;
> The birds of heaven shall carry forth the sound;
> The swift of wing, the secret word reveal.

We may even say that it exists throughout, with a few exceptions, perhaps, that may be regarded as introductory or transition sentences, such as brief descriptions of the writer's outward state (i. 12, 13, as also i. 16) and the frequent formulas: "I said in my heart,"—"then I turned again to behold," etc. But after each of these, the strain goes on as before. It is musing, meditative, measured thought, in a peculiarly arranged diction, sometimes presenting much regularity in its rhythmical movement, as in chaps. i., xi. and xii., and sometimes seeming so far to lose it that it is known to be poetry only by the inward marks,—that is, the musing cast of thought, and that soul-filling, yet sober emotion which calls up the remoter and more hidden associations, to the neglect of logical or even rhetorical transitions. It is this latter feature that gives to Koheleth an appearance which its name, according to its true etymology, seems to imply—namely, of a collection of thoughts as they have been noted down, from time to time, in the memory or common-place book of a thoughtful man, not aiming to be logical, because he himself knows the delicate links that bind together his ideas and emotions without express grammatical formulas, and which the reader, too, will feel and understand, when he is brought into a similar spiritual state. Such a spiritual transition is aided by the rhythmical form, however slight, producing the feeling that it is truly poetry he is reading, and not outwardly logical statements of dogmatic truth,—in short, that these gnomic utterances are primarily the emotional relief of a meditative soul, rather than abstract ethical precepts, having mainly a scientific or intellectual aspect.

In this thought there seems to be found that essential distinction between poetry and prose, which goes below all outward form, whether of style or diction, or which, instead of being arbitrarily dependent on form, makes its form, that is, demands a peculiar dress as its most appropriate, we may even say, its most natural expression. In other words, poetry is ever subjective. It is the soul soliloquizing,—talking to itself, putting in form, for itself, its own thoughts and emotions. Or we might rather say that primarily this is so; because, in a secondary sense, it may still be said to be objective and didactic in its ultimate aim, whilst taking on the other, or subjective, form, as least indicative of a disturbing outward consciousness, and, therefore, its most truly effective mode of expression even for outward uses. That this, however, may be the more strongly felt on the part of the reader, his mind, as has been already said, must be en rapport with that of the writer, that is, it must get into the same spiritual state, by whatever means, outward or inward, suggestive or even artificial, this may be effected. Poetry is the language of emotion; and it is true of all poetry, even of the soberest and most didactic kind. This emotion may be aroused by the contemplation of great deeds, as in the Heroic poetry, whether of the epic or dramatic kind, or of striking natural objects, as in the descriptive, or of great thoughts contemplated as they arise in the mind, with more of the wonderful or emotional than of the logical or scientific interest. This is philosophical poetry,—the thinker devoutly musing, instead of putting forth theses, or aiming primarily to instruct. The utterance is from the fullness of the spirit, and, in this way, has more of didactic or preceptive power than though such had been the direct objective purpose. We have a picture of such a mind, in such a state, in this philosophical poem of Koheleth, with just enough of rhythmical parallelism to awaken the emotional interest. It is this representation of a bewildered, questioning, struggling soul, perplexed with doubt, still holding fast to certain great fundamental truths regarded rather as intuitions than as theorems capable of demonstration, which makes its great ethical value. This value, however, is found in it chiefly as a whole. It consists in the total impression; and we shall be disappointed, often, if we seek it in the separate thoughts, some of which are exceedingly skeptical, whilst others we may not hesitate to pronounce erroneous. It is this subjective picture which the higher, or the divine, author has caused to be made, preserved, and transmitted to us, for our instruction (πρὸς διδασκαλίαν—προς παιδείαν, see 2 Tim. iii. 16), so that along with some things fundamental, immutable, which the thoughtful soul can never part with, we may also learn how great the darkness that hangs over the problem of the human and the mundane destiny when illuminated by nothing higher than science and philosophy, either ancient or modern. We need not hesitate to say, that so far as these are concerned, the teaching of the book is as important for the 19th century as it was in the days of Koheleth, whoever he may have been, or at whatever early time he may have lived. STUART thinks differently. Remarking on the affirmations respecting the vanity of what is called "wisdom and knowledge," he says: "Put such a man as Koheleth, at the present time, in the position of a Laplace, Liebig, Cuvier, Owen, Linnæus, Day, Hamilton, Humboldt, and multitudes of other men in Europe and in America, and he would find enough in the pursuit of wisdom and knowledge, to fill his soul with the deepest interest, and to afford high gratification." "But it does not follow [he adds] that Koheleth felt wrongly, or wrote erroneously, at his time, in respect to these matters. Literary and scientific pursuits, such as are now common among us, were in his day, beyond the reach, and beyond the knowledge of all then living; and how could he reason then in reference to what these pursuits now are?" (STUART, Com. on Ecclesiastes, p. 141). Now Koheleth admits that knowledge, whatever its extent, even mere human knowledge, is better than folly; it is better than sensual Epicureanism; even the sorrows of the one are better than the joys of the other, more to be desired by a soul in a right state; and yet, not in view of any small amount, but of the widest possible extent, does he say that "he who increases knowledge" (knowledge of mere earthly things, knowledge of links instead of ends, knowledge of man's doings, merely, instead of God's ways) only "increases sorrow." The wonder is, that there is not more commonly felt, what is sometimes admitted by the most thoughtful men of science, that the more there is discovered in this field the more mystery there is seen to be, the more light the more darkness following immediately in its train and increasing in a still faster ratio,—in short, the more knowledge we get of nature, and of man as a purely physical being, the greater the doubt, perplexity, and despair, in respect to his destiny, unless a higher light than the natural and the historical is given for our relief. In this respect the modern physical knowledge, or claim to knowledge, has no advantage over the ancient, which it so much despises, but which, in its day, and with its small stock of physical experience, was equally pretentious. Read how LUCRETIUS exults in describing the atomic causality, and the wonderful discoveries that were to banish darkness from the earth, and put an end to that dreaded Religio—

Quæ caput a cœli regionibus ostendebat,
Horribili super adspectu mortalibus instans.

How greatly does it resemble some of the boasting of our 19th century, and yet how does our modern science, with its most splendid achievements (which there is no disposition to underrate) stand speechless and confounded in the presence of the real questions raised by the perplexed and wondering Koheleth! What single ray of light has it shed on any of those great problems of destiny which are ever present to the anxious, thoughtful soul! "Our science and our literature!" How is their babble hushed in the presence of the grave! How wretchedly do they stammer when asked to explain that which it concerns us most to know, and without which all other knowledge presents only "a lurid plain of desolation," a "darkness visible," or to use the language of one much older than MILTON, "where the very light is as darkness!" How dumb are these boasting oracles, when, with a yearning anxiety that no knowledge of "the seen and temporal" can appease, we consult them in respect to "the unseen and eternal!" They claim to tell us, or boldly assert that the time is rapidly coming when they will be able to tell us, all that is needed for the perfectibility of human life. But ask them now, what is life, and why we live, and why we die? No answer comes from these vaunting shrines. They have no reply to the most momentous questions: Whence came we? Whither go we? Who are we? What is our place in the scale of being? What is our moral state, our spiritual character? Is there any such thing as an immutable morality? Is there a true ethical rising at all above the physical, or anything more than the knowledge and prudent avoidance of physical consequences? Is there any hope or meaning in prayer? Is there a holy law above us to which our highest ideas of righteousness and purity have never risen? Is there an awful judgment before us? Are we probationers of a moral state having its peril proportioned to an inconceivable height of blessedness only to be attained through such a risk? Is there, indeed, a great spiritual evil within us, and a mighty evil One without us against whom we have to contend? Is there a great perdition, a great Saviour, a great salvation? Is man truly an eternal and supernatural being, with eternal responsibilities, instead of a mere connecting link, a passing step, in a never completed cycle of random "natural selections," or idealess developments, having in them nothing that can truly be called higher or lower, because there is no spiritual standard above the physical, by which their rank and value can be determined?

Such questions are suggested by the reading of Koheleth, although not thus broadly and formally stated. In his oft-repeated cry that "all beneath the sun is vanity," there is, throughout, a pointing to something above the sun, above nature, above the flowing world of time, to that "work of God" which he says (iii. 14) is לְעוֹלָם, "for the eternal," immovable, without flow, without progress, perfect, finished,—"to which nothing can be added, and from which nothing can be taken,"—that high "ideal world," that unmoving Olam, where "all things stand,"—that spiritual supernatural paradigm for the manifestation of which in time, nature with all its flowing types and paradigms was originally made, and to which it is subservient during every moment, as well as every age, of its long continuance. All here, when viewed in itself, was vanity, but מֵעַל הַשֶּׁמֶשׁ, supra solem, above the sun, there stood the real. He was sure of the fact, though he felt himself utterly unable to solve the questions connected with it. This makes the impressiveness of his close, when, after all his "turnings to see," and his "thinkings to himself," or "talkings to his heart," he concludes, as Job and the Psalmist had done, that the "fear of God is the beginning of wisdom," and the keeping of His commandments "the whole of man" (כל האדם), his great "end," his constant duty, his only hope of obtaining that higher spiritual knowledge which alone can satisfy the soul (John vii. 17). This he fortifies by the assurance that all shall at last be clear: "For God will bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil."

It is this continual pointing to the "unseen and eternal" [לעולם] that constitutes the peculiar poetical character of the book, so far as the thought is concerned. And then there is the subjective style: "I thought to myself"—"I said to my heart"—"I turned again to see"—"I went about, I and my heart;" this, together with the measured diction into which it naturally flows, forms the more outward poetical dress. There are in Koheleth the germs of ideas that extend beyond the utmost range of any outward science, or even of any merely dogmatic ethical teaching. It was the inner spirit of the reader, through his own inner spirit, that he sought to touch. These "thinkings to himself" filled his soul with an emotion demanding a peculiar style of utterance, having some kind of rhythmical flow as its easiest and most fitting vehicle. Why it is, that when the soul muses, or when, under the influence of devout feeling, or inspiring wonder, it is thus moved to talk to itself, it should immediately seek some kind of measured language, is a question not easily answered. It presents a deep problem in psychology which cannot here be considered. The fact is undoubted. The rhythmical want is felt in ethical and philosophical musing, as well as in that which comes from the contemplation of the grand and beautiful in nature, or the heroic and pathetic in human deeds. Some have denied that what is called gnomic, or philosophical poetry is strictly such, being, as they say, essentially prose, artificially arranged for certain purposes of memory and impression. We may test the difference, however, by carefully considering what is peculiar, outwardly and inwardly, to some of the most striking examples of this kind of writing, and noting how the power, character, and association of the thoughts are affected by the rhythmical dress, even when of the simplest kind. Pope's Essay on Man, for example, has been called simply measured prose; but it is in fact, the highest style of poetry, better entitled to be so characterized than the greater part of his other rhythmical compositions. Certain great ideas belonging to the philosophy of the world and man, are there contemplated in their emotional aspect. Wonder, which enters into the very essence of this highest species of poetry, is called by Plato "the parent of philosophy," and this is the reason why the dry and logical Aristotle, who could intellectually analyze what he could not emotionally create, gives us that remarkable declaration (De Poetica, chap. ix.) διὸ καὶ φιλοσοφώτερον καὶ σπουδαιότερον ΠΟΙ'ΗΣΙΣ ἱστοριας ἐστίν—"Wherefore it is that poetry is a more philosophical and a more serious thing than history itself." In perusing the composition of Pope referred to, we are immediately, and without formal notice, made to feel this contemplative, wondering, emotive power, through the sympathetic influence of the outward dress. The measured style thus disposes us as soon as we begin to read. We are thereby put in harmony with the subjective state of the writer. We begin to muse as he muses, whilst the rhythmical flow causes our emotions, and associations of thought, to move easily, and without surprise, in the same smooth channel, however irregular it might seem if viewed under another aspect. We are not reading for knowledge, or ethical instruction even, but for the reception of that same emotion which prompted the seemingly irregular utterance. Under the binding influence of the melody, we no longer expect logical or scientific connections. There is felt to be a uniting under-current of thought and feeling, so carrying us along as to supply the want of these by the merest suggestions, some of them, at times, very far off, seemingly, whilst others come like inspirations to the meditative spirit, or seem to rise up spontaneously from the bubbling fountain of emotional ideas. Taking away the rhythm from such a work immediately does it great injustice, by destroying this sympathy. Put it in a prose dress, and we, at once, expect closer connections, more logical, more scientific, more formal, more directly addressed to an outward mind. The one soul of the writer and the reader is severed, the inspiration is lost, the dogmatic becomes predominant, whilst the intellect itself is offended for the want of those stricter formulas of speech and argument which its systematic instruction demands. Not finding these, we call it strange, rhapsodical, or unmeaning. What before impressed us now appears as trite truisms, and the fastidious intellect, or fastidious taste, contemns what a deeper department of the soul had before received and valued without questioning. The cause of this is in the fact that there are some thoughts, called common (and it may be that they are indeed very common), yet so truly great, that to a mind in a right state for their contemplation, no commonness can destroy the sense of their deep intrinsic worth. Truisms may be among the most important of all truths, and, therefore, all the more needing some impressive style of utterance, some startling form of diction, to arouse the soul to a right contemplation of their buried excellence. Undeterred by their commonness, the musing mind sees this higher aspect; it recognizes them in their connections with the most universal of human relations, and even with eternal destinies. The emotion with which this is contemplated calls out a peculiar phraseology, placing the thought in the foreground of the mind's attention, and divesting it of its ordinary homely look. This startling diction appears especially in the original language, if understood. We turn such meditations into prose; first in our words, as happens necessarily in a process of rigid, verbal translation,—then in our thoughts—and having thus stripped them of that rhythmical charm which called attention to their hidden worth, their real uncommonness, we pronounce them trite and unmeaning.*

Koheleth in his homely prose version—especially our English Version—suffers more, in this

*[Such common-places abound in the best poetry, ancient or modern. Often, when rightly set, they furnish its most precious gems. Especially is this the case with the more sombre and meditative poetry, as in YOUNG's Night Thoughts, and the more serious poems of TENNYSON. "Many of the ideas of his In Memoriam," says a certain critic, "are the merest common-places; strip them of their stilted verbiage, and there is nothing left but the most vapid truisms." Such criticism is, itself, both vapid and shallow. Common ideas have their uncommon or wonderful aspects, which the common mind fails to see, or loses sight of because of their supposed commonness. Thus, time presents a very ordinary conception, but think of it in connection with its infinite past, its infinite future, its infinitesimal present, or as an immeasurable cycle repeating itself, and "demanding the ages fled," as Koheleth represents it (chap. i. 10; iii. 15), and how full of the most solemn awe, as well as the deepest personal interest. Take, for example, one of the most ordinary truisms that we find in almost every mouth: "The past is gone, we can never recall it." How tame and prosaic it sounds when presented way, than the Psalms or Proverbs, where the Hebrew parallelism is so clear in its general structure, and the antithesis of emphatic words demanded for each particular arrangement is so striking, that the poetical character appears in almost any version; the poorest translation, that has any claim to be faithful, not being able wholly to disguise it.

The object, therefore, is to give to a translation of Koheleth such a rhythmical dress, be it ever so slight and plain, that the reader may thereby make some approach to the mental position of the original utterer, or assume, instinctively, as it were, something of his subjective state. It is to lead him, by something in the outward style, to feel, however slightly, the meditative, emotional, yet sobered spirit of the writer—to give the mind that turn—(and a mere starting impulse may do it) which shall make it muse as he muses, and soliloquize as he soliloquizes, without being surprised at those sudden transitions, or those remote suggestions, which seem natural to such a state of mind when once assumed. They are natural, because the writer, understanding his own thoughts, and even feeling them, we may say, needs, for himself, no such logical formulas, and the reader equally dispenses with them as he approaches the same position. They are like modulations that are not only admissible but pleasing in a musical flow, whilst they would appear as flattened chords, or harsh dissonances, if set loose from their rhythmical band. Such is very much the appearance which the thoughts of this book often present when read merely as didactic prose, and this is doing them great injustice. For one example out of many, of these seemingly abrupt transitions in Koheleth, take chap. vi. 6: "unto one place go not all men alike?" There seems, at first view, little or no connection here. It is, however, the meeting of an objection that silently starts up, making itself felt rather than perceived as something formally stated: "Length of life is no advantage, rather the contrary, if one has lived in vain: Do not they both, the man of extreme longevity, and the still-born, or the born in vain, go at last to the same mother earth whence they came?" What avails, then, "his thousand years twice told?" If the reader's mind is in harmony with the writer's, and with his style, he sees the association, and is more affected by such apparent abruptness than he would have been by the most formal logical statement. He gets into the current of feeling, and this carries him over the apparent logical break.

It may be said, too, that such a rhythmical Version may be all the more faithful to the thought on this very account of its rhythmical form. It may be more literal, too, if by literal we mean that which most truly puts us in the mental position of the old writer, giving not only the thought, as a bare intellectual form, but, along with it, the emotion which is so important a part of the total effect, and even of the thought itself regarded as an integral state of soul. To accomplish this, Hebrew intensives must be represented, in some way, by English intensives, of like strength, though often of widely different expression. There is often, too, an emotional power in a Hebrew particle which may be all lost if we aim to give only its illative force. This is especially the case with a גַּם or a כִּי. The former always expresses more or less of surprise or wonder, along with its additive force of too, or moreover. The translation is to be helped, in merely as a truth or dogma. But give it a subjective interest such as comes from the diction and association in which YOUNG presents it, and how full of emotion!

> Hark! 'tis the knell of my departed hours;
> Where are they? With the years beyond the flood; or as it appears in the Hebrew parallelism of Koheleth (chap. vii. 24):

> Far off! the past—where is it?
> Deep! a deep, O who shall find it?

Or as the kindred thought meets us in the musings of TENNYSON:

> But the tender grace of a day that is dead,
> Will never come back to me.

Of course, it will never come back. As a mere fact, or preceptive statement, we want no teacher, inspired or uninspired, to tell us that. But what, then, has changed the dry truism into a thought so full of the most touching interest that we read the simple lines over and over again, wondering at the strange power that is in them. It is in the rhythm, some would say. This is true, but not in the mere auricular sense. The rhythm has an effect, though the measure is of the simplest kind. It will be found, however, on analysis, to consist in the fact of its disposing the reader to the meditative or subjective state of soul. It sets the mind soliloquizing, unconsciously, as it were. It makes the thought and language seem, for the moment, as though they were the reader's own. It brings the idea to him in its emotional rather than in its intellectual, or dogmatic, aspect. In other words, it presents the uncommon side of the seeming truism. It is not only a deep view of being in general, but it is one that belongs to himself; and this is the secret of his emotion.—T. L.]

such cases, by our expressive particle yea, or some interjectional form such as, ah! this too! yea, verily, this too! Again, the illative power in the Hebrew particle may be much wider, and more varied, than that of any single one which we may select as corresponding to it in any single case. Thus כִּי connects by denoting a cause, reason, or motive; but it may be a reason against, a reason notwithstanding, as well as a reason for; just as the Greek ἕνεκα may mean for the sake of, or in spite of,—for all that—as ἕνεκα ἐμοῦ, "on my account," or for all that I can do. In the latter case כִּי should be rendered although, a meaning rare in other parts of the Bible, but quite common, we think, in Ecclesiastes, and furnishing the right key to some otherwise obscure passages. Thus in chap. vi. 4, כִּי־בַהֶבֶל בָּא is rendered, "for he cometh in with vanity," which simply inverts the illative aim of the particle as determined by the context. It reads as though the "coming in with vanity and departing in darkness," were assigned as the cause, or reason why, the abortion, or the "vainly born," is better than he who "vainly lived,"—thus making it the reason why instead of the reason notwithstanding, as it truly is. When we render it although, and supply the same particle in all the connected clauses, the meaning, which is so confused in our common English Version, becomes not only clear but most impressive. Again, this very frequent little word may be a transition, or starting particle, denoting a reason, and an emotion connected with it, but this emotion arising from an under-current of thought, or from something that starts up to the mind during a pause in the soliloquizing discourse. The speaker sets off again with a כִּי, yet, surely, yea verily so is it; as though what he had been thinking must have been thought by others near him. There are quite numerous examples of this kind in Koheleth, but the best illustration may be taken from a passage in Job where the ultimate thought is very similar to the one which pervades this book. To explain it there is required the very admissible supposition of a brief pause, or silence, holding still the flow of the discourse after some impassioned utterance. This is in accordance with the nature of grave oriental speaking, whether dialectical or continuous. It may be said, too, that such pauses of emotional silence, though occupying much shorter intervals in the middle of the dialogue, are of the same kind, and of the same spirit, with the silence described Job ii. 13: "And they sat with him on the earth seven days, and seven nights, and none spake a word unto him, for they saw that his grief was very great." Some such rest of silence may be supposed to have occurred after the impassioned close of the xxvii. chapter. We are almost driven to this view from the fact, that the xxviii. seems to have so little of direct, or, in fact, of any discoverable connection with it. When Job begins again "to take up his parable," his thoughts seem to have drifted to a great distance; and yet, during the silence, the thread has been preserved. It has been carried away by a devious current, but we recover it again before the new strain closes. So great has seemed the difficulty of connecting these two chapters, that PAREAU (De Jobi Notitiis, etc., p. 247) reasons plausibly to show that there has been a misplacement, and that chap. xxviii. should come immediately after chap. xxvi. But there is a better explanation, and more in harmony with the spirit of this wonderful book. After the strong appeal of the xxvii., and the vivid picture, there presented, of the bad man's ruin, we find Job, instead of applying it directly to his own defence, or his defence of the ways of God, starting off in a strange manner, and with this particle כִּי, presenting no reason for what was said, seemingly, just before, but forming, as it were, the transition chord to a new modulation: "For there is a vein for the silver" (כִּי יֵשׁ) or, "surely there is an outlet for the silver, and a place for the gold," etc. What is the illative force of כִּי in this place, or what connective office does it perform at all? Far off, as it would seem, from the former train of thought, the speaker goes on to describe the human zeal and energy in its search for the treasures and secrets of nature. And most graphically is this done. The references in the beginning are to mining operations, in which men had made what might seem a wonderful progress in the earliest times: "He (man) puts a limit to the darkness" [he pushes farther and farther back the horizon of the unknown]; "he searches out to the very end (as CONANT well translates it) the stone (the ore) of darkness, and of the shadow of death." Away from the ordinary human haunts "he hangs suspended" (over the shaft of the mine). In wilds which even "the vulture's eye had not seen, nor the fierce lion ventured to tread, he sendeth forth his hand, and turneth up the mountain from its roots." "He cutteth out channels in the rocks,—he bindeth the fountains from overflowing, and that which is most hidden bringeth he forth to light." Now what is the association of thought that led to this? We soon see it. It reappears in that yearning interrogatory: "But where shall wisdom be found? O where is the place of understanding?" All these discoveries, however great they may be conceived to be (and the searching appeal is as much to our own as to the earliest times) are not wisdom—הַחָכְמָה—"the wisdom." They give us not the great idea or reason of God in the creation of man and the world: "The deep" (the great Tehom) still "saith, it is not in me; the sea saith, it is not with me." "It is not found in the land of the living," in the world of active life; and yet, strange as it may seem, "a rumor thereof" has reached the dark, silent unboasting under-world. "Death and Abaddon (the state in which man seems to be lost, or to disappear) say, we have just heard the fame thereof with our ears." It is the wisdom which is known only to God, or to those to whom He reveals it,—His moral purpose in the origination and continuance of nature, and in the dark dispensations of human life. It is the spiritual idea of the supernatural world, to which the natural is wholly subservient, but to which neither its ascending or descending links do ever reach. To this, all unknown as it is, though firmly believed, does Job appeal in repelling the shallow condemnation of his friends, and the shallow grounds on which they place it. This is God's wisdom, which was with Him when He made nature and the worlds. Man's wisdom is to believe in it, to submit himself to it, to stand in awe of it, and to depart from evil, as the beginning of that course through which alone there can come any clearing of the mystery to the human soul. This connects the speaker with the former train of thought, or the vindication of God's ways as righteous, however dark they may seem in the human history, whether of the race or of the individual. The pause, the apparent break, is that which leads to the higher strain. So it is in the musings of Koheleth, less sublime, perhaps, less impassioned, but with no less of grave impressiveness. It is only when we thus read it as meditating, soul-interrogating, poetry, that we get in the right vein for understanding its subtle associations of thought.

In Koheleth, too, as in Job, there are certain underlying ideas, firmly held, and that never change. Though "clouds and darkness are round about" them, they form the מְכוֹן כִּסֵּא "the foundation of the throne,"—the settled basis of his belief in the eternal Righteousness. These no scepticism ever invades. They have not the appearance of inductions from experience, or from any kind of logical argumentation; neither are they so put forth. They are rather holy intuitions, inspirations we might style them, which admit of no uncertainty: "I know that whatsoever God doeth is for the olam," the eternity, the world idea; "nothing can be put to it nor any thing taken from it" (iii. 14). Earth may be full of wrong, but "there is One Most High above all height, that keepeth watch" over the injustice and oppression of men (v. 7): "Though a sinner do evil a hundred times, and his days be prolonged, yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, but it shall not be well with the wicked" (viii. 12). He knew it; his faith not only went beyond sight, but stood strong even in opposition to sense and earthly experience: "I said in my heart, the righteous and the wicked God shall judge;" for "there, too" (שָׁם, even there, in the great Olam, or world plan, mentioned just above), "is there an appointment for every purpose, and for every work" (iii. 17). This judgment will not be merely through blind "physical consequences," as though it were man's highest duty to obey nature [according to a favorite modern system of naturalizing ethics], instead of ofttimes having to fight against it,—but by a glorious and unmistakable manifestation of God Himself, somewhere in the malkuth kol olamim, or cycle of the Olams. It shall be "when God demands again the ages fled" [iii. 15], יְבַקֵּשׁ אֶת נִרְדָּף, literally, "makes inquisition," or "seeks that which is pursued." As the solemn proclamation is sent after the fleeing homicide, so shall He demand again the ages of wrong that have chased away each other in the revolutions of time. They shall be summoned to stand before His bar. The past is not gone; it is to appear again in the judgment, as real as in the events for which it is to be judged. Yea, more real will be that reappearing than any thing in the unheeded movements of the present. Neither will it be the exhibition of a general or abstract justice: "For God will bring every work into judgment with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil" [xii. 14]. It is this strong Hebrew faith in the Holy Justice which the Rationalist commentators overlook in their absurd comparing of some things in this book with the dogmas of the later* Grecian schools. It wholly severs the reverent, God-fearing Koheleth from the sensual Epicurean, on the one hand, and the fatalizing, naturalizing Stoic, on the other. His darkness is better than their light, his very doubts are more suggestive than their most "positive philosophy." It is this God-fearing, yet man-loving, spirit, that makes his calm utterances so much more impressive than all their babbling disputations about pleasure and pain, the summum bonum, and the reality of evil. All good, he teaches, is from God, even the power to find any satisfaction in eating and drinking (ii. 24, when rightly interpreted, v. 18, 19), and yet again, "sorrow is better than mirth" (viii. 3), not on account of any ascetic merit in the endurance of pain and grief, but because a saddened state of soul is more in sympathy with a sad and fallen world, such as the writer evidently conceives it to be [see vii. 29; ix. 3; iii. 18]. "Sorrow is better than mirth," because it has more heart, more thought; it is more becoming, more humane, and, therefore, more rational in view of the vanity of life, and its abounding woes. It is better, as purifying and beautifying the soul, and thus producing, in the end, a serener happiness (vii. 3).

as יִיטַב לֵב should be rendered, giving a clear and impressive antithesis, and being in accordance with the more common usage of the phrase, as denoting comeliness, or even cheerfulness of spirit, rather than moral improvement merely, as our common version gives it: As the face is outwardly marred by such grief for the woes of human life, the heart grows inwardly in serene spiritual beauty. Never was this more impressively illustrated than in the life of the "Man of sorrows," whose "visage was so marred more than any man, and his form more than the sons of men" (Isaiah lii. 14; liii. 3).

These great underlying ideas of Koheleth, and the manner in which they appear, form its most peculiar characteristic. It is its recognition that distinguishes the thoughtful reader from the one who would flippantly characterize the style of the book as homely, and its thoughts as confused and common-place. These immutable truths may be compared to a strong and clear under current of most serious thinking, rising, at times, above the fluctuating experiences that appear upon the surface and as constantly losing themselves in the deeper flow. It is the feeling of this under current that may be said to form the subjective band of thought. It furnishes the true ground of that rich suggestiveness which pervades the whole composition, and thus constitutes an important element of its poetical character.

In giving a rhythmical version, however plain, to such a book as Koheleth, it should be borne in mind that some degree of inversion as well as measured or parallelistic movement, is among the demands of the poetical style in all languages. Such inversion, however, exists to a much less degree in the Hebrew, than in the Latin and Greek, and may, therefore, be more easily represented in English. In truth, a version may be made more clear, and more literal, as well as more musical, in this very way. It may sometimes be accomplished by a faithful following of the original in its scantiness as well as in its fulness. Our English version of the Bible inserts in italics the substantive verb where it is not in the Hebrew. It does this, often, to the marring of the thought, and the enfeebling of the emotion: "From everlasting unto everlasting thou art;" how much more forcible, and, at the same time, more rhythmical, the literal following of the Hebrew: from everlasting thou. This may seem a very slight difference, but the effect on a wide scale, had such literal following been

*[The earlier Greek ideas, as manifested in their solemn dramatic poetry, before the Epicurean philosophy had been fully introduced, remind us strikingly, sometimes, of the language and ideas of the Bible. Nowhere else, out of the Scriptures, is this doctrine of retributive justice, and its awful certainty, more sternly set forth. The manner of expression, sometimes, shocks our more merciful Christian ideas; yet still we recognize in them the primitive dogma of the divine unfailing Justice, as inseparable from the divine Power and Wisdom:

ἡ παλαίφατος
ΔΙΚΗ ξύνεδρος Ζηνὸς ἀρχαίοις νόμοις.

DIKÉ, renowned of old,

SOPH. Œd., Col. 1381.—T. L.]

constantly practised, would have been very strongly felt. "Vanity of vanities," says our English version, "all is vanity." Leave out the useless substantive verb: "Vanity of vanities, all—vanity." A very slight change again, but it has more effect for the ear, as well as for the feeling. It is no longer an abstract, dogmatic affirmation, but an exclamation of wonder. Intensive phrases, however, generally refuse a strict verbal rendering, unless they have become naturalized, as it were, in our language, through a long used literal translation of the Scriptures, or in any other way. Thus that oft-repeated "vanity of vanities" (the Hebrew use of the construct. state with the plural for something superlative) may stand as it does, instead of being rendered "most vain," or "utterly vain." So again for the Hebrew סוֹבֵב סֹבֵב (i. 6), the most literal is the best sounding, as well as the most forcible translation: "Whirling, whirling," or "round, round,"—"round about, round about"—instead of our tame and prosaic rendering: "it whirleth about continually," or the still poorer Vulgate: Lustrans universa in circuitu. In other cases, a verbal rendering will not do at all; and yet in some way, must their intensiveness be given, or it is no true translation,—that is, no translation, or setting over, of what is most essential, which, in such a book as Koheleth, is the emotion, the state of soul, rather than the bare description or ethical thought. Thus, for example, in the Hebrew, the plural is sometimes used to express what is superlative or very great; as in chap. ii. 8, the expression שִׁדָּה וְשִׁדּוֹת, which, in our English version is most strangely rendered, "musical instruments and that of all sorts." The best Jewish authority regarded שִׁדָּה as the feminine of שַׁד, the common word for the breast, used here (the only case of its occurrence) as more feminine and voluptuous, and representative of Solomon's numerous wives and concubines. See KIMCHI, and ABEN EZRA who cites as a parallel phrase, רַחַם רַחֲמָתַיִם ("a damsel or two," expressed euphemistically) Judges v. 30. Now render this literally, "a breast and breasts," and how tame it sounds; how bare is it of all emotion! We want something to express this intensive sense, be it an intensive particle, or any other intensive word—"the breast, yea, many breasts,"—the seven hundred fair female bosoms on which Solomon, in "the days of his vanity," had the choice of reposing. The manner of saying it, and the feeling with which it is said, would furnish no slight argument that it is a real, and not merely a representative Solomon, who is speaking here. Sometimes this emotion, this intensity, is expressed, or rather suggested, simply by the rhythmical form of the translation, even though it be of the slightest kind;—the inverted or measured style immediately indicating such an emotional state of soul, as other language, in another order, would not have done. For all these reasons, it is no paradox to assert, that a rhythmical version of the book, such as is here attempted, may be the most true and literal, placing the reader's soul in some degree of harmony with that of the writer, not only as regards the general subject, but also in respect to the true thought and feeling of particular passages. To answer this purpose, there is need only of such a degree of inversion as our language most easily admits, and which might have been much more freely used than it has been in our common version. Such a style, freely employed in rendering all the poetical books, would have become naturalized in English through this very means. It might have been called prose, but would have had much more of the power of the poetical, and would have enabled us, whilst rendering most literally, to have entered more deeply into the thought of the sacred books through the emotion which is such an essential accompaniment of the thought, and of which a poor prose translation almost wholly divests it. In addition to this more inverted style, there is required only the simplest iambic movement, made as smooth as possible, but without much regard to the equality of the lines. The Version accompanying may be open to criticism in these respects, but the effect would, in fact, be weakened by having it too labored, even if that could be consistent with literalness. In short, there is wanted, for such a purpose, just enough of rhythm to arrest the attention, and set the mind in the direction of the inward harmony, without occupying it with an excessive artificialness. On these accounts it is hoped that the attempted rhythmical version will give the reader a better view, by giving him a better feeling of Koheleth (both as a whole, and in its parts) than can come from the very homely and defective prose translation of our English Bible, or even from the German of ZÖCKLER, which is rhythmical only in appearance; since it simply follows the Hebrew accents in the divisions of the parallelisms, which are less evident in this book than in other parts of the Bible styled poetical. In the version offered, there is very little of what can be called addition or paraphrase. Some few places there are, in which brief explanatory words have been placed in parenthetical brackets, but they are not used to any greater extent than the explanations and connections that are found in the marginal readings of our English Version. These additions, though marked by enclosing lines, are included in the measured movement, and may, therefore, be read without interrupting it. They show the connections of thought, which are virtually in the Hebrew, in cases, often, where a verbal translation would fail to exhibit the full power of its conciseness. In such instances they are not additions, nor explanatory paraphrases, but genuine parts of a true translation. In other cases, the mere inversion discloses the association of thought, which we fail to see in the common rendering, because its unhebraical order divests certain words of that emphasis through which the connection is plainly marked in the original—more plainly, sometimes, than by any logical terms of assertion.

The measure employed is the Iambic, with occasional use of the Choriambus. The most usual lines are the pentameter, or the common English blank verse line, the Iambic of seven feet, the most musical of our English measures, with, occasionally, the less musical, because less used, Senarius. The shorter lines, of three or four feet, are used for the transitions and cadences which mark the flow of thought. One who carefully compares it with the original will see that the translation here attempted keeps to the Hebrew accentual divisions, with very rare exceptions, and, in most cases, (although a somewhat difficult task) to the measure of their verbal conciseness. Some few parts are regarded as bare prose, and are given accordingly, such as the first verse of the book, the passages from ver. 12 to ver. 14, and verses 16 and 17, of the first chapter, as also verses 9 and 10 of the twelfth chapter. These are viewed as simply introductory to what follows. Without at all affecting our view of the authenticity and inspiration of the book, they may be regarded as scholiastic prologues, or epilogues, made by some other hand, as explanatory of the whole poem, or of some particular things in it; as, for example, verses 9 and 10 of chap. xii. seem to be an added note (by some enthusiastic admirer, himself divinely guided) to show that Solomon's own language answers the description given in verse 11 that follows, beginning: " words of the wise, etc." The reader will find remarks on these, both by ZÖCKLER and the editor, in their respective places.—T. METRICAL VERSION.

SAYINGS OF KOHELETH,

SON OF DAVID, KING IN JERUSALEM.

N. B.—The marginal numbers denote the chapters and verses of the common English Version. The smaller figures in the text refer to the brief notes in the margin, explanatory of differences between this and the common Version, or referring to pages where such explanations may be found.

I.

The introductory Thought and constant Refrain. Continual cyclical changes in Nature and in Human Life. Nothing new beneath the sun.

CHAPTER I.

2 O vanity of vanities! Koheleth saith;
O vanity of vanities! all—vanity.
3 What gain to man in all his toil, he toils beneath the sun?
4 One generation goes, another comes;
But the earth for the world[1] abides.
5 Outbeams[2] the sun, and goes beneath, the sun;
Then to his place, all panting,[3] glowing,—there again is he.
6 Goes to the South, the wind, then round to North again;
Still round and round it goes;
And in its circuits evermore returns the wind.
7 The rivers all are going to the sea;
And yet the sea is never full;
Whence came the rivers, thither they return to go.
8 All words[4] but labor; man can never utter it.
With seeing, eye is never satisfied;
With hearing, ear is never filled.
9 What WAS is what again SHALL BE;
What has been made, is that which shall be made;
There's nothing new beneath the sun.
10 Is there a thing of which 'tis said, Lo this is new?
It hath already been in worlds that were before.
11 Of former things the memory is gone;
Of things to come shall no remembrance be
With those that shall come after.

Koheleth gives an account of himself, his kingly estate, his pre-eminence in Wisdom and experience, with meditations on the fruitlessness of human efforts, and the sorrows of knowledge. Prose mingled with verse.

CHAPTER I.

12, 13 I Koheleth was king over Israel in Jerusalem, and I set my heart to seek and to explore by wisdom all that is done beneath the sun,—That painful study which God has given to weary with.

14 I looked on all the works performed beneath the sun;
And Lo! all vanity, a chasing[5] of the wind.
15 That which is crooked cannot be made straight;
The lacking can't be numbered.

16 Then said I in my heart, Lo! I have become great; I have increased in wisdom beyond 17 all before me in Jerusalem; my heart hath seen much wisdom, and knowledge. Yea, I set my heart to know wisdom,—to know vain glory, too, and folly. This also did I see to be a caring for the wind.

18 For in much of wisdom there is much of grief;
And who increaseth knowledge, still increaseth sorrow.

III.

The Attempt to unite Pleasure and Wisdom—Figure of the Unruly Horse—The reining of the Flesh—The Heart guiding as Charioteer—Koheleth's ample means for the Experiment—Its wretched Failure—All Vanity.

CHAPTER II.

1 Then said I in my heart again—
Go to—I'll try thee now with pleasure.
Behold the GOOD. This, too, was vanity.
2 Of laughter, said I, it is mad;
Of mirth—O what availeth it?
3 Then in my heart I made deep search,—
To rein[6] my flesh in wine;
My heart in wisdom guiding;
To take near hold of folly, till I saw
What kind of good is that for Adam's sons
Which they would get, the numbered days they live,
Beneath the heavens.
4 Great works I did.
Houses I builded, vineyards did I plant,
5 Gardens and parks; fruit trees of every kind
6 I planted there. I made me water pools,
To water thence the wood luxuriant[7] of trees.
7 I gat me serving men, and serving women;
Thralls of my house were born to my estate;
Whilst store of cattle, yea of flocks were mine,
Surpassing all before me in Jerusalem.
8 I gathered to me also silver—gold,—
Treasures of kings, the wealth of provinces.
I gat me singing men, and singing women.
That choice delight of Adam's sons was mine,—
The breast[8]—yea many breasts.
9 So I was great, and grew in greatness more than all
Who were before me in Jerusalem.
My wisdom also still stood firm to me.

10 Of all mine eyes did ask I nought refused.
My heart I held not back from any joy.
For joyful was my heart in all my toil;
And this my portion was from all my toil.
11 Then looked I to the work my hands had wrought,
The labor I had labored in the doing;
And Lo! all vanity—a chasing of the wind;
No gain beneath the sun.

IV.

Contemplation of Wisdom and Folly—Koheleth is sure that Wisdom far excels Folly—But he is puzzled to see how slight the practical Difference in Life—One seeming Chance to all—All alike forgotten—Koheleth's Grief—His Hatred of Life and Discontent.

CHAPTER II.

12 Again I turned to think of wisdom, madness, folly;
For what shall he do who succeeds the king?
[What else than] that which they have done already.
13 As light excels the darkness, so I thought[9]
There surely must be gain to wisdom over folly.
14 The wise man's eyes are in his head [they say[10]],
The fool in darkness walketh.
And yet I know that one event awaits them all.
15 Then said I in my heart
Like the fool's chance so hath it chanced to me;
And wherefore, then, am I the wiser?
I told my heart, this, too, was vanity.
16 As of the fool, so also of the wise;
There's no remembrance that abides forever;[1]
In that the days are coming—have already come—
When all is clean forgotten.
Alas![2] how is it that the wise should die as dies the fool!
17 And then I hated life.
For grievous seemed the work performed beneath the sun,
Since all is vanity—a chasing of the wind.
18 I hated also all the labor I had wrought.
For I must leave it to a man who shall come after me.
19 Will he be wise or foolish? who can know?
Yet he will rule in all for which I've toiled,
In all I've wisely planned beneath the sun.
This, too, was vanity.

V.

Koheleth's Desperation—All vanity again.

CHAPTER II.

20 Thus I revolved[3] until it made my heart despair,
Of all the labor I had wrought beneath the sun.
21 For so it is; there's one whose toil is evermore
In wisdom, knowledge, rectitude;
And then to one who never toiled he yields it as his prize.
O this is vanity—an evil very sore.

22 For what remains to man in all his labor?
In all his heart's sore travail, as he toils beneath the sun?
23 Since all his days are pain, his occupation grief.
This, too, is vanity.

VI.

The true Good not in the power of man—Who could do more to find it than Koheleth? All the gift of God.

CHAPTER II.

24 The good is not in[4] man that he should eat and drink,
And find his soul's enjoyment in his toil.
This, too, I saw, is only from the hands of God.
25 For who could more indulge?
Who faster, farther, run[5] (in such a race) than I?
26 To him who hath found favor in His sight
Doth God give wisdom, knowledge, joyfulness;
But to the sinner gives He travail sore,
To hoard and gather for the man whom he approves.
This, too, was vanity—a caring for the wind.

VII.

A time for every thing. The great world time, or world-problem, which men can never find out.

CHAPTER III.

1 To every thing there is a time,
A season fit, to every purpose under heaven;
2 A time to be born—a time to die,
A time to plant—a time to dig up what is planted,
3 A time to kill—a time to heal,
A time to break—a time to build again,
4 A time to weep—a time to laugh,
A time to mourn—a time to dance,
5 A time to scatter stones—a time to gather them again,
A time to embrace—a time to refuse embracing,
6 A time to seek—a time to lose,
A time to keep—a time to cast away,
7 A time to rend—a time to sew,
A time to hold one's peace—a time to speak,
8 A time to love—a time to hate,
A time of war—a time of peace.
9 What gain to him who works, in that for which he labors?
10 I saw the travail God hath given the sons of men,
That they should toil therein.
11 Each in its several time, hath He made all things fair;
The world-time[6] also hath He given to human thought;
Yet so, that man, of God's great work, can never find,
The end from the beginning.

VIII.

In worldly things, enjoyment and success the only good proposed. This God's gift. The Inquisition of the Past.

CHAPTER III.

12 There is no other good in them, I know,
But to enjoy, and to do well in life;
13 Yea, more,—to every man,
That he should eat and drink, and find enjoyment in his toil—
Even this is God's own gift.
14 For all God's work, I know, is for eternity.[7]
No adding to it—from it no diminishing.
And this He does that men may fear before Him.
15 What was is present now;
The future has already been;
And God demands again the ages fled.[8]

IX.

The Injustice in the world—God's sure Judgment—God's trial of men to prove them—Human Life and its Destiny as judged by human conduct—"Man who is in honor and abideth not is like the beasts that perish"—One chance, seemingly, to all.

CHAPTER III.

16 Again I looked beneath the sun—
The place of judgment—wickedness was there.
The place of righteousness—I saw injustice there.
17 Then said I in my heart:
The righteous and the wicked God will judge.
For there,[9] too, unto every purpose, and for every work, 18 There is a time appointed.
This said I in my heart—because of Adam's sons—
When God shall try them—for themselves to see
That they—in their own estimation[10]—are as beasts.
19 (So seems it)—one event for man, for beast,—one doom for all.
As dieth this, so dieth that—one breath is for them all.
There is no pre-eminence to man above the beast.
Since all is vanity.
20 Unto one place (the earth) go all alike.
All come from earth, and all to earth return.
21 For who (among them) is it that discerns,[1]
The spirit of the man that goeth up on high,
The spirit of the beast that downward goes to earth?
22 And so I saw there was (for them)[2] no higher good Than that a man should joy in his own work,
Since this his portion is.
For who shall take him there to see
What shall be after him?

X.

Koheleth turns again—The sight of oppression changes the view—The Dead seem better off than the Living—Labor, when it prospers, only a source of envy—The envious fool's content in his idleness.

CHAPTER IV.

1 And then I turned again—
I looked on all the oppressions done beneath the sun.
For Lo! the tears of the oppressed, who had no comforter;
Whilst on the oppressors' side was power, to them no comforter.
2 O then I praised the dead who died long since,
More than the living men who now survive.
3 Ah! better than them both is that which hath not been,
Nor ever seen the evil work performed beneath the sun.
4 Again I thought of toil as prospering in its work,
That this is cause of hate to one man from his neighbor.
Yea, this is vanity, a caring for the wind.
5 The fool (in envy) folds his hands and his own flesh devours.
6 For better (saith he)[3] is the one hand full of quietness,
Than both hands full of toil and windy vain desire.

XI.

Another vanity—The lone Miser—The good of Society.

CHAPTER IV.

7 I turned to look again beneath the sun—
And Lo! another vanity!
8 There is one alone; he has no mate, no son or brother near,
And yet there is no end to all his toil.
With wealth his eyes are never satisfied.
Ah me![4] for whose sake do I labor so?
Or why do I keep back my soul from joy?
O this is vanity and travail sore.
9 Better are two than one, for then there is to them
A good reward in all their toil.
10 For if they fall, the one shall raise his friend.
But woe to him who falls alone, with none to lift him up.
11 If two together lie, they both have heat;
But how shall one be warm alone?
12 If one be stronger, two shall stand against him.
Nor quickly can the triple cord be broken.

XII.

Changes in the individual and political life—The lowly exalted, the high abased—Changes in the world-life—The passing generations.

CHAPTER IV.

13 Better the child, though he be poor, if wise,
Than an old and foolish king, who heeds no longer warning.
14 For out of bondage comes the one to reign;
The other, in a kingdom[5] born, yet suffers poverty.
15 I saw the living all, that walked in pride[6] beneath the sun.
I saw the second birth[7] that in their place shall stand.

X. [3] P. 81. XI. [4] P. 51, second note. XII. [5] Excursus, p. 84.—[6] The same.—[7] Excursus, p. 85.

16 No end to all the people that have gone before;
And they who still succeed, in them[8] shall find no joy.
This, too, is vanity, a chasing of the wind.

XIII.

Reverence in worship—In speaking—Observance of vows. Against superstition, dreams and fortune-telling—Fear God alone.

CHAPTER V.

N. B.—In the Hebrew this chapter begins with ver. 2.

1 O keep thy foot when to the house of God thou goest.
Draw nigh to hear.
'Tis better than to give the sacrifice of fools;
For they know not that they are doing evil.[9]

2 O be not hasty with thy mouth, nor let thy heart be rash
To utter words before the face of God.
For God in heaven dwells, thou here on earth.
Be, therefore, few thy words.

3 As in the multitude of care there comes the dream,
So, with its many words, the voice of fools.

4 When thou hast made a vow to God, defer not to fulfill.
He has no delight in fools—pay, then, as thou hast vowed.

5 'Tis better that thou shouldst not vow, than vow and not perform.

6 Give not thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin;
Nor say before the angel:[10] "'twas an error."
Wherefore should God be angry at thy voice?
And why the labors of thy hands destroy?

7 Though dreams abound and vanities, presagings numberless,
Yet fear thou God.

XIV.

Be not stumbled at sight of oppression and oppressors—There are Higher Powers than they—And God is over all.

CHAPTER V.

8 When, in a province, thou beholdest the oppression of the poor,— Bold robbery of judgment and of right;
At such allowance marvel not.
Since One most high, above all height, is keeping watch.
Yes—there be higher[1] far than they.

9 For every (rank) has profit from the soil,
The king himself owes[2] homage to the field.

XV.

Wealth never satisfies—The laborer's contented sleep.

CHAPTER V.

10 Who silver loves, with silver ne'er is satisfied,
Nor he who loves increase of wealth, with revenue.
This is another vanity:

11 When wealth increases, they increase who spend;
And what the owner's gain, except to see it with his eyes?

12 Sweet is the laborer's slumber, be it less he eat or more;
Whilst the abundance of the rich permits him not to sleep.

XII. [8] The same. XIII. [9] P. 89, and note p. 141.—[10] P. 90, second note. XIV. [1] P. 91, second note.—[2] P. 92, note.

XVI.

Another sore evil—The hoarding miser, who loses his wealth and dies poor—Darkness, Sickness, and Wrath.

CHAPTER V.

13 There is another grievous woe I've seen beneath the sun,— Wealth hoarded to its owner's hurt.
14 With the sore travail (it had cost)[3] that wealth departs;
The son whom he begets is left with nothing in his hand.
14 Then bare, as from his mother's womb he issued forth, Doth he return (to earth) poor as he came,
And nothing takes he of his toil to carry with him there.
16 O a sore evil this!
In all points as he came, so shall he go,
And what his profit that he thus should labor for the wind?
17 Yea, all his days doth he in darkness eat.
Abundant sorrow, sickness too is his,[4] and chafing wrath.

XVII.

The summing up of Koheleth's experience—The true Good, the Good that is fair—The ability to see good in anything is God's own gift—"His favor is more than life"—Makes the mere enjoyment of life little remembered.

CHAPTER V.

18 And now behold what I have seen!
GOOD[5] that is fair, to eat and drink, and see the good
In all the toil that one may toil beneath the sun,
The number of the days that God has given 19 To be his portion here—yea, every man,
As God has given him wealth and great estate,
And power to eat thereof,
To bear his portion, and be joyful in his toil—
THIS GOOD[6] (I say) is God's own gift.
20 For little will he call to mind, the days that he has lived,
When God doth thus respond to him in joyfulness of heart.

XVIII.

Koheleth turns again to the dark side—The rich man to whom God has not given the true good—compared to the untimely birth—He who vainly lives, less blessed than the vainly born

CHAPTER VI.

1 Another evil have I seen beneath the sun,
And great it is to man;
2 There is one whom God endows with wealth,
And store of goods, and glorious estate;
Who nothing lacks of all his soul desireth,
Yet God gives him no power to eat thereof;
For one, an alien[7] born, devoureth it;
This, too, is vanity, a very sore disease.
3 Though one beget a hundred sons—though he live many years,— Yea, though to countless days his life extends—
His soul unsatisfied with good, and he no burial have;
The untimely born, I said, is better sure than he.

XVI. [3] P. 93, second note.—[4] P. 94, note. XVII. [5] P. 94, second note.—[6] The same. XVIII. [7] P. 99, first note.

4 For though[8] in vanity it comes, and into darkness goes,—
And darkness cover deep its name,—
5 Though[8] it hath never seen the sun, nor aught hath ever known,— Yet better rests (the vainly born) than He [who vainly lived];
6 Yea, though he lived a thousand years twice told,
Yet never saw the good.
Unto one place, go not all men alike?[8]

XIX.

Unsatisfactoriness of human life and efforts—To the Wise, the Fool, the Poor—Content better than the Wandering of the soul—The frailty and earthliness of man as indicated by his name Adam—He cannot strive with his Maker—Multiplication of words—They only increase vanity.

Chapter VI.

7 All toil of man is ever for his mouth;
And yet the appetite is never filled.
8 What profit to the wise ('tis asked)[9] beyond the fool?
What to the poor, though knowing how to walk before the living?
9 Better the eyes beholding (say)[10] than wandering of the soul.
This, too, is vanity.
10 What each thing is, its name was named of old;
Known thus for what he is,[1] is Adam (named from earth);
And that he cannot strive with One so far in might excelling.
11 Though many words there are, in vain they multiply;
What profit then to man?
12 For who knows what is good for man in life,
The number of the days of his vain life,
He spendeth like a shadow gone? For who can tell to man
What shall be after him beneath the sun?

XX.

The sorrowful aspects of life better than the jovial—Better than the song of fools the chidings of the wise—Here, too, there is vanity—Since insolence of station and bribery may cause even the wise to err.

Chapter VII.

1 Better the honored name than precious oil;
Better the day of death than that of being born.
2 Better to visit sorrow's house than seek the banquet hall;
Since that (reveals) the end of every man,
And he who lives should lay it well to heart.
3 Better is grief than mirth;
For in the sadness of the face the heart becometh[2] fair.
4 The wise man's heart is in the house of mourning;
The fool's heart in the house of mirth.
5 Better to heed the chiding of the wise
Than hear the song of fools.
6 For like the sound of thorns beneath the pot,
So is the railing laughter of the fool.
This, too, is vanity.
7 For even the wise may arrogance[3] inflate,
A bribe his heart corrupt.

XXI.

Sundry maxims—The end determines—Be patient—Fret not—No mark of Wisdom to praise the past—In Wealth there is defence of life, in knowledge life itself—In prosperity be joyful—In adversity be thoughtful—God hath set one over against the other.

CHAPTER VII.

8 Better the issue of a thing than the beginning.
Better the patient than the proud in soul.
9 O be not hasty in thy spirit angrily to grieve;
For in the bosom of the fool such anger ever dwells.
10 Say not, why is it, days of old were better days than these?
'Tis not from wisdom comes such questioning.
11 Wisdom is fair with fair inheritance;[4]
And gain excelling hath it then for men.
12 In Wisdom's shade, as in the shade of Wealth, [Defence of life][5]; but knowledge hath pre-eminence (in this),
That wisdom giveth life to its possessor.

13 Survey the works of God;
For who can make that straight which He hath left deformed?
14 In days of good, be thou of joyful heart;
In evil days, look forth (consider thoughtfully)
How God hath set the one against the other,
That aught of that which cometh after man may never find.

XXII.

Koheleth's sad experience—the wicked prospering—the good depressed. Over-righteousness—Be not too knowing—The fear of God the only safety—Wisdom stronger than strength—None righteous, no, not one—Heed not slanders.

CHAPTER VII.

15 Much have I seen, of all kinds,[6] in my days of vanity.
The righteous man who perished in his righteousness;
The wicked man, with life prolonged in wickedness.
16 Nor over-righteous be, nor over-wise;
For why thyself confound?
17 Nor over-wicked be, nor play the fool;
Why die before thy time?
18 Better hold fast the one, nor from the other draw thy hand;
But he alone who feareth God comes out unscathed[7] from all.
19 One wise man there may be whom wisdom stronger makes,
Than ten the mightiest captains in the city;
20 But one,[8] a righteous man, on earth is never found,
Who doeth always good and sinneth not.
21 [Learn this] too, give not heed to every word that flies;
Lest thine own servant thou shouldst hear reviling thee;
22 For many the time, as thine own soul well knows,
That thou thyself hast other men reviled.

XXI. [4] P. 107, first note.—[5] P. 107, second note. XXII. [6] P. 108, first note.—[7] P. 109.—[8] P. 109, third note.

XXIII.

Koheleth's desire to learn the great past. He then turns to seek wisdom in human life. The evil woman—A good one hard to find—One man in a thousand. Man made upright; now fallen.

CHAPTER VII.

23 All this have I essayed for wisdom's sake.
O that I might be wise, I said, but it was far from me;
24 Far off—the past, what is it?[9] deep—that deep, O, who can sound?
25 Then turned I, and my heart, to learn, explore,
To seek out wisdom, reason—sin to know,—
Presumption,—folly,—vain impiety.
26 Than death more bitter did I find the wife Whose heart is nets and snares, whose hands are chains.
The blest of God from her shall be delivered;
The sinner shall be taken.
27 Behold, this have I found, Koheleth saith;
[As reckoning] one by one, to sum the account;
28 That which my heart was ever seeking though I found it not:
Out of a thousand, one man have I found;
Amidst all these, one woman seek I still.
29 This only have I found—behold it,—God made man upright;
But they have sought devices numberless.

XXIV.

Wisdom lighteth up the face. Koheleth's kingly admonition—Submission to right authority. The rebellious spirit—Safety of obedience.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 Who like the wise, or him who knows the reason of a thing?
Man's wisdom lighteth up his face,—its aspect stern is changed.
2 I, a king's mouth (do speak it),[10] heed it well;
By reason, also, of the oath of God;
3 In anger, from the [ruler's] presence hasten not;
Nor boldly stand in any evil thing;
For that which he hath purposed will he do.
4 Where'er the mandate of a king, there, too, is power;
And who shall say to him, what doest thou?
5 Who simply keeps the statute knows[1] no harm;
Yet still, the wise in heart doth time and judgment heed.

XXV.

Man's evil great, yet reason and justice in it all—No resistance in the warfare with death. Impotency of wickedness.

CHAPTER VIII.

6 For surely unto every purpose is there time and judgment fixed,
Although[2] man's evil be so great upon him,
7 Unknowing, as he is, of all that is to come.
For how it shall be, who is there to tell him?
8 Over the spirit, none has power to hold it back;
No strength availeth in the day of death;
For in that warfare there is no release;
And wickedness is impotent to free the sinner there.

XXIII. [9] Note pp. 113, 114. XXIV. [10] P. 113, Text Note to v. 2.—[1] P. 117, note. XXV. [2] P. 118, first note.

XXVI.

A close survey—Power hurtful to its possessors—The wicked rulers dead—Buried in Pomp—Forgotten.

CHAPTER VIII.

9 This too I saw—'twas when I gave my heart
To every work that's done beneath the sun—
That there's a time when man rules over man to his own hurt.

10 'Twas when I saw the wicked dead interred;
And to and from[3] the holy place (men) came and went;
Then straight were they forgotten in the city of their deeds.
Ah! this was vanity.

XXVII.

Human presumption arising from impunity—Judgment slow but sure—No good to the sinner notwithstanding appearances—"Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with him—Joy to the righteous, it shall be well with him."

CHAPTER VIII.

11 Since sentence on an evil work is not done speedily,
Therefore the hearts of Adam's sons are filled with thoughts of wrong.

12 Yet though the sinner sin a hundred times, with life prolonged, Still know I this—it shall be well with those who worship God,—
Who stand in awe before Him.

13 But for the sinner there is nothing good;
Nor shall he lengthen out his days that like a shadow (flee),
This man who hath no fear (to sin) before the face of God.

XXVIII.

Koheleth's faith grows weak again—He stumbles at the sight of the same seeming chance to all—It is then that he extols pleasure—No good except to eat, etc.

CHAPTER VIII.

14 'Tis vanity, what's done upon the earth, for so it is,
That there are righteous unto whom it haps as to the vile,
And sinners, too, whose lot is like the doings of the just.
For surely this is vanity, I said.

15 'Twas then[4] that pleasure I extolled:
How that there was no good to man beneath the sun;
Except to eat, and drink, and here his joy to find;
And this alone attends him in his toil,
During all the days of life that God has given beneath the sun.

XXIX.

The mystery deepens—No human philosophy can solve the problem of life—We can only say, "all things are in the hands of God:" Human Love and Hatred—The unknown All as it bears upon all—The seeming outward confusion in moral states—The still greater invisible evil in the hearts of men—Then to the unknown after state—Hope in the living—The highest form of death inferior to the lowest life.

CHAPTER VIII.

16 According as I gave my heart to know what wisdom was,
And to explore the travail sore that's done upon the earth,
[So sore that day and night the eyes no slumber take]

17 'Twas then I saw that man can never find the work of God;
That work which now is going on beneath the sun.
For though one labor in the search, his search is all in vain.
Yea, though the sage[5] may boast his knowledge, still he finds it not.

XXVI. [3] P. 119, note. XXVIII. [4] P. 120, note. XXIX. [5] Pp. 67, 68, note.

CHAPTER IX.

1 For this before my heart I set—all this to understand—
Even this (great mystery) how that the righteous and the wise,
With all their works, are in the hands of God.
Their love, their hatred too; man knows it not, the all[6] that lies before him;
2 The all according as it is to all—one fate to all—
The just, the vile, the good, the pure, the one with sin defiled;
To him who offers sacrifice—to him who gives it not;
As to the good, so unto him that sins;
As to the perjured, so to him who fears to break his oath.
3 Yes, this the evil sore in all that's done beneath the heavens:
That thus one doom should come to all alike.
And then, so full of evil are the hearts of Adam's sons!
Yea, madness in their hearts, whilst they do live;
Then to the dead they go.
4 For there is hope in one whose life still joins[7] the living throng.
To a living dog there's greater worth than to a lion dead.

XXX.

Koheleth's views of the state of the dead—Not as a state of extinction, but as opposed to the present active, loving, hating, scheming life—The unknown state of being to which there is no participation in the works of this world "beneath the sun."

CHAPTER IX.

5 The living know that they must die, the dead they nothing know.
For them there is no more reward, forgotten is their name.
6 Their hate, their love, their zeal, all perished now;
Whilst the world lasts, no portion more have they,
In all the works performed beneath the sun.

XXXI.

On this there follows a strain of sorrowing irony—[In language the opposite of 1 Cor. vii. 29]—Alas O man!—If it be all of life to live—Then go thy way, eat, drink thy wine—There is no judgment—God accepts thy works—Get all the good thou canst out of "thy day of vanity"—There is no work or scheme in Sheol. Comp. Wisdom of Solomon, II. 6.

CHAPTER IX.

7 Go then, with gladness eat thy bread, and merrily drink thy wine,
For God already hath accepted all thy works.
8 In every season be thy garments white,
And oil be never wanting to thy head.
9 Live joyful with the wife whom thou hast loved,
During all the days of thy vain life,—that life[8]
Which God hath given to thee beneath the sun—
Yea, all thy days of vanity.
For this thy only portion is in life,
And in thy weary toil which thou hast toiled beneath the sun.
10 Do then whate'er thy hand shall find in thine own might[9] to do,
For there's no work, no plan, no knowledge, no philosophy[10],
In Sheol, where thou goest.

XXIX. [6] Vaihinger, p. 124, 2d col.—[7] P. 125, 1st note. XXXI. [8] P. 126, second note.—[9] Excursus II., p. 135, 1st col.—[10] Excursus I., p. 131, 1st col.

XXXII.

Koheleth turns again—He revises and retracts what had been said—All such advice to live merrily is vain, because there is no certainty in human affairs, and human efforts—All Wisdom, therefore, and all resolving to be happy may be in vain.

CHAPTER IX.

11 I turned again to look beneath the sun.
Not to the swift the race I saw, nor victory to the strong,
Nor to the wise secure their bread, nor to the prudent wealth,
Nor favor to the knowing ones, but time and doom to all.

12 For man knows not his time.
Like fishes taken in the net, or like to birds ensnared,
So are the sons of Adam snared when comes the evil hour,
And falls upon them suddenly, unwarned.

XXXIII.

Koheleth gives an historical example of the little avail that wisdom is to its possessor, yet still protesting its desirableness, and its intrinsic superiority to strength and weapons of war—How sin and folly, too, may render it ineffectual, and even turn it to evil.

CHAPTER IX.

13 This, too, I saw, a mystery[1] great [to me] beneath the sun:

14 A little city—few its men—a monarch great invading,
With hosts surrounds, and builds against it mighty mounds of siege.

15 A man was found therein, a poor man, yet most wise.
This man the city by his wisdom saved;
Yet no one did that poor wise man remember.

16 Then said I, true it is, that wisdom's more than strength;
Yet see—the poor man's wisdom—how despised, his words unheard!

17 Words of the wise! in quiet are they heard
Beyond the shout of him who rules o'er fools.

18 Sure, wisdom is a better thing than instruments of war;
Though all its good so great one sinner may destroy.

CHAPTER X.

1 Like as dead flies, with frothy taint, the fragrant oil corrupt,
So taints[2] a little folly, one for worth and wisdom famed.

XXXIV.

A series of moral meditations, having more of suggestive than of logical association—Their main drift, that men should employ their faculties in the best way they can, notwithstanding the little efficiency of human wisdom in securing good and avoiding evil.

CHAPTER X.

2 The wise man's heart is on his right, the fool's heart on his left.

3 Even by the way, as walks the fool, his understanding fails,
And unto every one he meets, his folly he proclaims.

4 If e'er against thee swell the ruler's rage, leave not thy place;
Though great the offence, the yielding spirit calms.

5 Another evil have I seen beneath the sun:
An error such as comes from princes' favor;

6 Folly is set on high, the rich sit lowly on the ground.

7 Servants on horses mounted have I seen;—
Princes, like servants, walking on the earth.

XXXIII. [1] P. 127, note.—[2] P. 138, note.

XXXV.

There is danger, too, in the ordinary avocations of life.

CHAPTER X.

8 Who digs a ditch himself may fall therein.
Who breaks a hedge, a serpent there may bite him.
9 He who removeth stones, gets hurt thereby,
Who cleaveth trees, by them is put in peril.
10 If dull the iron, and its edge he fails to sharpen well,
Then greater force he needs,[3] and help of wise dexterity.

XXXVI.

The babbler—Speech of the wise—Of the foolish—Vain predictions.

CHAPTER X.

11 A serpent that without enchantment bites—
So is the slanderer's tongue; no gain hath it to its possessor.
12 Words of the wise man's mouth,—they're words of grace;
Lips of the fool,—the fool himself they swallow up;
13 His words in folly that began, in raving madness end.
14 Predicting[4] words he multiplies; yet man can never know,
The thing that shall be, yea, what cometh after who shall tell?
15 Vain toil of fools! it wearieth him,—this man that knoweth naught
That may befall his going to the city.[5]

XXXVII.

Evils of bad government—A blessing on the well-ruled State—Evils of slothfulness—The feast for joy—But money answers all—Revile not the powerful, or the rich.

CHAPTER X.

16 Woe unto thee, O land,—thy king a child,—
Thy nobles rising early to the feast.
17 Blessed art thou, O land,—thy king the son of princely sires,— Thy nobles timely in their feasts, for strength,—not revelry.
18 Through slothfulness the building goes to ruin;
When hands hang down, the house lets[6] in the rain.
19 For mirth do men prepare the feast, and wine to gladden life;
But money is the power that answers all.
20 Not even in thy thought revile the king,
Nor in thy chamber, dare to curse the rich;
The bird of heaven shall carry forth the sound;
The swift of wing the secret word reveal.

XXXVIII.

Be boldly liberal—Let nature have its course—But do thy present duty—The Spirit's mysterious way—The secret of life known only to God—Be diligent and leave the issue to God—Life is sweet, but remember the day of darkness.

CHAPTER XI.

1 Upon the waters boldly cast thy bread;
For thou shalt find it after many days.
2 To seven a portion give, yea, more, to eight;
Thou knowest not what evil may be coming on the land.
3 If clouds be full of rain, they pour it on the earth.
Whether to North, or South the tree shall fall,
Where'er it falls, there shall it surely lie.

XXXV. [3] P. 140. XXXVI. [4] P. 141, note.—[5] Pp. 141, 142, note. XXXVII. [6] P. 143, second col.

4 He who observes the wind shall never sow.
Who gazes on the clouds shall never reap.
5 'Tis like the spirit's way;[7] thou knowest it not;
Or how the bones do grow within the pregnant womb;
Even so thou knowest not the way of God,
Who worketh all.

6 Then in the morning sow thy seed;
Nor yet at evening stay thy hand.
For which shall prosper, this or that,
Or both alike shall profit bring,
Lies all beyond thy ken.

7 Sweet is the light, and pleasant to the eye to see the sun.
8 Yet if a man live many years, rejoicing in them all,[8]
The days of darkness let him not forget,
That they are many; all that cometh, still is vanity.

XXXIX.

Youth warned of Judgment—Declared to be Vanity—Early Remembrance of the Creator—Old age and its gathering Darkness—The dissolving Earthly House. Figure of the Castle with its Keepers—Its men of Might—Its Purveyors, or Grinders—Its Watchmen—Its closing Gates—Fears of old age—Its Burdens—Its Hoary Hairs—Its failing Desire—The Beth Olam, or House of Eternity—Other Figures—The Broken Lamp—The Ruined Fountain—The Flesh to Dust—The Soul to God. The closing cry of Vanity—Hebel Hebalim—"A vapor that appeareth for a little while," Jas. iv. 14.

CHAPTER XI.

9 Rejoice O youth in childhood; let thy heart
Still cheer thee in the day when thou art strong.[9]
Go on in every way thy will shall choose,
And after every form thine eyes behold:
But know that for all this thy God will thee to judgment bring.
10 O then, turn sorrow from thy soul, keep evil from thy flesh;
For childhood and the morn[10] of life, they, too, are vanity.

CHAPTER XII.

1 Remember thy Creator, then, in days when thou art young;
Before the evil days are come, before the years draw nigh;
When thou shalt say—delight in them is gone.
2 Before the sun, the morning light,[1] the moon, the stars, grow dark,
And after rain the clouds again do evermore return;
3 Before the keepers of the house do shake,
Its men of might [its strong supporters] bend,
And they who grind, in strength and numbers, fail;
When darkness falls on them who from the turret windows watch;[2]
4 And closing are the doors that lead abroad;[3]
When the hum[4] of the mill is sounding low,
Though it rise[5] to the sparrow's note,
And voices[6] loudest in the song, do all to faintness sink.

XXXVIII. [7] Excursus, p. 147.—[8] P. 151, note. XXXIX. [9] Pp. 151, 152, note.—[10] P. 152, second col.—[1] P. 154, first note—[2] P. 155, first note—[3] P. 155, second note.—[4] P. 155, third note.—[5] The same.

5 When they shall be afraid of what is high;
And terrors fill the way;
And the almond[7] tree shall bloom,
The insects' weight oppress,[8]
And all desire shall fail;
For thus man goes to his eternal house,[9]
Whilst round about the streets the mourners walk—
6 Before the silver cord shall part,[10] the golden bowl be dashed,
The bucket broken at the spring, the wheel at cistern crushed, 7 And dust goes down to earth from whence it came,
And soul returns again to Him who gave it at the first.

8 O vanity of vanities, the preacher saith,
O vanity of vanities! all—vanity.

XL.

A prose Scholium by the general author, or compiler, praising the wisdom of Koheleth, and the excellence of his doctrine, with a closing poetic extract from the Solomonic meditations, as suitable to it. This is followed by the solemn conclusion to the whole as taken from the same ancient source.

CHAPTER XII.

9 And moreover; Because the Preacher was wise,[1] he continued to teach the people know-
10 ledge. Yea, he gave an attentive ear, and sought out, and set in order, many parables. The Preacher sought to find acceptable words, and what he wrote was upright, even words of truth.

11 Words of the wise! like piercing goads are they;
Like driven nails their gathered[2] sentences,
All from One Shepherd given.

THE GRAND CONCLUSION.

12 Be warned, my son,—'tis only left to say—
Of making many chapters[3] there's no end;
And thinking long is wearying to the flesh.
13 The great conclusion hear:
FEAR GOD AND HIS COMMANDMENTS KEEP, FOR THIS IS ALL OF MAN.
14 For every work, yea, every secret deed,
Both good and evil, God will surely into judgment bring.

THE

SONG OF SOLOMON.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. NAME AND ARTISTIC FORM OF THE SONG OF SOLOMON.

The title שִׁיר הַשִּׁירִים, "Song of songs," or, as it is more fully expressed in i. 1, שִׁיר הַשִּׁירִים אֲשֶׁר לִשְׁלֹמֹה "The Song of songs, which is Solomon's," describes this book neither as a "series (chain) or collection of many songs" (as KLEUKER, AUGUSTI, VELTHUSEN, PAULUS suppose), nor as one prominent among the many songs of Solomon (according to IBN EZRA's and D. KIMCHI's translation: "A song of the songs of Solomon"). "Song of songs" (Sept., ᾆσμα ᾀσμάτων; Vulg., canticum canticorum) is without doubt rather designed to characterize this poem as the most excellent of its kind, as the finest, the most precious of songs. Of the many songs, which, according to 1 Kings v. 12, Solomon composed, the author of this title,—whom we must at all events distinguish from the poet himself, as is shown particularly by its אֲשֶׁר instead of the poetical abbreviation שֶׁ, which is always used in the song itself*—would exalt the one before us as especially commendable and elegant. This sense, suggested by analogies like "heaven of heavens" (1 Kings viii. 27), "servant of servants" Gen. ix. 25, "vanity of vanities" (Eccles. i. 2), "ornament of ornaments" (Ezek. xvi. 7),† which LUTHER has briefly and appositely expressed by "das Hohelied," is undoubtedly involved in the expression, whether אֲשֶׁר לִשְׁלֹמֹה, "which is Solomon's," be referred (as is usually done) to the principal subject in the singular שִׁיר, "song," or to the immediately preceding plural הַשִּׁירִים ("Song of the songs of Solomon=the noblest among the songs of Solomon;" so, e. g., HITZIG, EWALD, Dichter des A. Bds., 2d edit., I., 236; BLEEK, Einleit. in's A. T., 2d edit., p. 636).‡

* [There is no reason whatever to suspect, much less believe, that this title is of a later date than the book itself, of whose text it is without doubt a genuine and integral part. In its favor may be urged the usage of ancient writers, both sacred and profane, to preface their productions by some such brief statement of the author, theme or occasion. It stands upon the same ground with the titles to the Psalms and prophecies, whose originality has likewise been disputed, often on the most frivolous pretences, but never disproved. The correctness of this title is conceded, or is capable of being readily established. It was neither indecorous nor unnatural for the author to designate his own production as the Song of songs, if it involved the sacred mystery which all but the lowest class of erotic interpreters find in it. In the elevated diction of this Song the abbreviated and unusual form of the relative, which occurs only sporadically elsewhere, is employed exclusively throughout; but it surely need occasion no surprise that it is not found likewise in the prosaic title, as ZÖCKLER himself confesses, § 3, Rem. 2. The occurrence of אשר in Judg. v. 27 casts no suspicion on the genuineness of that verse though שׁ is used elsewhere in the song of Deborah, ver. 7. Nor, on the other hand, does a single שׁ, where אשר is, the prevailing form, discredit Gen. vi. 3 or Job xix. 29. Both forms of the relative likewise occur interchangeably in Ecclesiastes, and both are found in the writings of Jeremiah.—TR.]

† [Other superlatives of like construction are the Holy of holies, Ex. xxvi. 33; King of kings, Ezek. xxvi. 7; God of gods and Lord of lords, Deut. x. 17 (but not Josh. xxii. 22, where the original is different); see also Dan. viii. 25, Ps. lxxii. 5, comp. Rev. i. 6. The same idiom is found in the Greek of the New Testament, e. g., an Hebrew of the Hebrews, Phil. iii. 5, and has even been transferred to English as in the phrase "heart of hearts."—TR.]

DOWAY: Solomon's Canticle of canticles. GENEVA: "an excellent Song, which was Solomon's," to which is added the note "Heb. a Song of songs, so called because it is the chiefest of those thousand and five which Solomon made, 1 Kings iv. 32." PATRICK: "The most natural meaning seems to be that this is the most ex-

The unity of its contents might accordingly be inferred from this most ancient denomination of the book, traditionally preserved in the Bible. The Song of Solomon is one poem, a poetical unit artistically arranged and consistently wrought out—not a collection of many songs put together like a string of pearls (HERDER), a "delightful medley" (GOETHE), an anthology of erotic poems without mutual connection (MAGNUS), a conglomerate of "fragments thrown together in wild confusion" (LOSSNER), etc. All these hypotheses which issue in the chopping up of this noble work of art (with which is to be classed in the most recent times the view taken by the Reformed Jews REBENSTEIN and SANDERS, which pares away portions of ch. iii. and viii. as spurious, and carves the whole into four songs) are utterly untenable. This appears both negatively from the meaningless and formless character of the fragments, great or small, which they create, and positively from the impression of unity and inner connection which an unprejudiced and thorough study of the whole produces. That in several passages the same sentence recurs in identical words as a refrain (see particularly ii. 7; iii. 5; viii. 4); that a chorus of "daughters of Jerusalem" is addressed no less than six times, and a seventh time is mentioned in the third person (iii. 10; comp. i. 5; ii. 7; iii. 5; v. 8; v. 16; viii. 4); that the relation of a lover to his beloved runs through the whole as the prominent theme, and prevailingly in the form of a dialogue or responsive song (see especially ch. i.; ii. 1–7; ch. iv.; ch. vii. and viii.); and finally that references not only to the times of Solomon, but to his person as the principal subject of all the descriptions and amatory outpourings of the heart stand out every where over and over again (i. 4, 5; iii. 7–11; vii. 6; viii. 11, 12); these are incontrovertible criteria of the strict unity of the whole which is not to be doubted even where particular portions seem not to cohere so well together, or where it remains uncertain to which of the actors a sentence or series of sentences is to be assigned. The whole is really a שִׁיר, a song or poem, i. e.. not a carmen (a lyric poem, hymn or ode), to be sung with instrumental accompaniment—in which case it would have been called מִזְמוֹר rather than שִׁיר—but a poem of a more comprehensive kind and of lyrico-dramatic character, a cycle of erotic songs, possessing unity of conception, and combined in the unity of one dramatic action. Whether now it be likened to the bucolic compositions of the later Greeks, and so be esteemed a Hebrew idyl or carmen amœbæum (so HUG, HERBST and older writers before them); or a proper dramatic character be claimed for it, and on this presumption it be maintained that it was actually performed in public, being both acted and sung after the manner of an opera (BÖTTCHER, RENAN), or at least was designed for such performance (EWALD); it must at all events be maintained as scientifically established and confirmed by all the details of its poetic execution, that its plan and composition are dramatic, and consequently that the whole belongs to the dramatic branch of the Old Testament Chokmah- (חָכְמָה) literature, and is the representative of the lyrico-dramatic (melo-dramatic) poetry of the O. T., as the Book of Job is the principal specimen of the epico-dramatic (didactic dialogue). Comp. the Introduction to the Solomonic Wisdom-literature in general (in commentary on Proverbs), § 5 and 10.

REMARK 1.—Against the attempt of IBN EZRA, KIMCHI and other Rabbins to explain שִׁיר הַשִּׁירִים as meaning "a song of the songs" may be urged not only the analogy of the expressions above adduced as "heaven of heavens," etc., but also the fact that this partitive sense would have to be expressed by שִׁיר מֵהַשִּׁירִים. The expression "a song of the songs of Solomon" would also have been strangely pleonastic, and have conflicted unduly with the analogy of the titles to the Psalms, which never contain more than the simple שִׁיר (or מִזְמוֹר, or שִׁיר מִזְמוֹר).—On the other hand, it makes against the interpretation: "a song of songs," i. e., "a collection of several songs, a chain of songs" (KLEUKER, Sammlung der Gedichte Salomo's, sonst das Hohelied genannt, 1780, p. 6 f.; AUGUSTI, Einleitung, p. 213), that then שִׁיר would have an entirely different sense the first time from that it has the second, as though it were synonymous with the Chald. שֵׁיר, "chain," and with the corresponding Arabic word, and signified "series" (so VELTHUSEN and cellent of all songs that Solomon made; yet the Chaldee paraphrase and abundance of Christian writers think it called the most excellent song, with respect likewise to all the songs that had been formerly made by any prophetical person, as those, Ex. xv.; Judg. v.; 1 Sam. ii., etc., because they celebrated only some particular benefits, this the immense love of God, not only towards that nation, but towards all mankind." POOLE: "The most excellent of all songs, whether composed by profane or sacred authors, by Solomon or by any other."] PAULUS, in EICHHORN'S Repertorium XVII., p. 109 f.).* This would the more conflict with Hebrew usage because this language has a special fondness for the combination of a noun in the singular with a dependent plural of like signification to denote the superlative. Comp. EWALD, Lehrb., § 313, c. [GREEN'S Heb. Gram., § 254, 2, a].—On Solomon's authorship indicated by אֲשֶׁר לִשְׁלֹמֹה comp. § 3 below.

REMARK 2.—The unity of the Song of Solomon has been repeatedly contested in recent times. HERDER ("Lieder der Liebe, die ältesten und schönsten aus dem Morgenlande," 1778) was followed in this direction not only by GOETHE (in the "Westöstlicher Divan" at least, whilst subsequently in his "Kunst und Alterthum" he declared for UMBREIT'S view that the whole possessed dramatic unity), but also by most of the theological commentators and critics down to the 20th year of the present century, particularly EICHHORN, BERTHOLDT, AUGUSTI, DE WETTE, in their Introductions to the Old Test.; KLEUKER, GAAB, DÖDERLEIN, GESENIUS, PAULUS, DÖPKE, and many others. And at a still later period, after EWALD (1826), KOESTER (in PELT'S "Theologische Mitarbeiten," 1839), UMBREIT ("Erinnerung an das hohe Lied," 1839) and others had contended for the unity of the poem with considerable energy and success, ED. ISID. MAGNUS (Kritische Bearbeitung und Erklärung des Hohenliedes Salomo's, Halle, 1842) with the greatest expenditure of acuteness and learning sought to prove that the whole originated from uniting a number of erotic songs and sonnets in an anthology. This "floral collection" contains according to him fourteen complete odes besides a number of fragments, which may all but one (ii. 15, fragment of a drinking song) be combined into three longer odes, together with two later supplements to two of these 17 or 18 pieces, thus making in all twenty distinguishable constituent parts, independent from one another in origin, and produced by several different poets at various periods. The seeming microscopic exactness of this investigation of MAGNUS made an impression upon several of the later critics, notwithstanding the evidently arbitrary manner in which the separate portions of the text "are shaken up together at pleasure like the bits of colored stone in a kaleidoscope." THEOD. MUNDT, in his "Allgem. Literaturgeschichte," 1849 (I., 153) considers it settled that the Song of Solomon is an anthology of disconnected popular erotic songs. E. W. LOSSNER (Salomo und Sulamith 1851) in his exegesis of the Song chiefly proposes to himself the task of "inventing some connection between the fragments thrown together in wild confusion." And BLEEK in his "Einleitung in's A. T." (2d edit., 1865, p. 641), edited by KAMPHAUSEN, thinks that with the admission that the whole, as it now exists, proceeded from one redactor, he must connect the assumption "that it contains sundry erotic songs," songs, too, only a part of which were composed with reference to Solomon, the greater portion having "relation to persons of the condition of shepherds,† and in the country."—The interpolation-hypothesis of the two Jewish interpreters, A. REBENSTEIN and DAN. SANDERS, is likewise based upon at least a partial dissection of the poem, the former of whom, in his "Lied der Lieder" (1834), the latter in BUSCH'S "Jahrbüch. der Israeliten," 1845, and in his little treatise lately issued, "das Hohelied Salomonis" (Leipzig, O. Wigand, 1866), maintain that at least chap. iii.—either the entire chapter, as REBENSTEIN imagines, or its first five verses, as SANDERS makes it—and the concluding verses viii. 8–14 are later insertions, and that the book "purged" of these alleged spurious additions contains four songs relating to Solomon's love for Shulamith and so far connected, but which are now out of their original order and somewhat divided. These four songs or sections of the "Idyl" are: 1) ch. i. 1–6; viii. 12; i. 7—ii. 6; 2) ch. ii. 7–17; iv. 1—v. 1; 3) ch. v. 2—vi. 10; 4) ch. iii. 6–11; vi. 11—viii. 7.

* [So GOOD: "The word שִׁיר, in the present and most other instances translated song, means in its original acceptation 'a string or chain;' it is precisely synonymous with the Greek σειρα. The different idyls presented in the collection before us were therefore probably regarded by the sacred poet, at the time of their composition, as so many distinct beads or pearls, of which the whole, when strung together, constituted one perfect שִׁיר, string, catenation or divan."]

† [GOOD regards the Song "as a collection of [12] distinct idyls upon one common subject—and that the loves of the Hebrew monarch and his fair bride. * * * The author of these exquisite amorets was King Solomon." FRY also finds in the Song "a number of distinct pieces" proceeding, it is true, from a common author, and having "some unity of design in regard of the mystic sense which they are intended to bear." But the parties described are not the same throughout. "Though King Solomon is mentioned, and his marriage processions perhaps gave occasion to some of these allegories, yet the scene is every now and then changed, and we are led to contemplate the intercourse and concerns of some rural or domestic pair in humble life." NOYES agrees substantially with FRY, but without admitting the existence of a mystical sense.—TR.]

The internal grounds for the unity and integrity of the whole, as they have been recently put together by DELITZSCH particularly ("das Hohelied untersucht und ausgelegt," Leipz., 1851, p. 4 ff.), following up the previous presentation of them by EWALD, UMBREIT, etc. (see above) are decisive against all these fragmentary and crumbling hypotheses, not to speak of the uniformity throughout of the style of the language (of which more particularly in § 4). The first five and the weightiest of these grounds are: 1) The name of Solomon runs through the whole, i. 5; iii. 7, 9, 11; viii. 11, 12; those passages also are to be included, in which he and no other is called המלך, "the king," i. 4, 12; comp. vii. 6. 2) Throughout the whole there appears in addition to the lover and his beloved a chorus of בנות ירושלים, "daughters of Jerusalem." These are addressed i. 5; ii. 7; iii. 5; v. 8, 16; viii. 4; and in iii. 10 something is said about them. This shows the sameness in the dramatic constitution of the whole. 3) Throughout the whole mention is only made of the mother of the beloved, i. 6; iii. 4; viii. 2, (5), never of her father. 4) Distinct portions of the whole begin and end with the same or similar words in the style of a refrain. A new paragraph begins three times with the question of surprise, מי זאת וגו, "Who is this," etc., iii. 6; vi. 10; viii. 5; the adjuration of the daughters of Jerusalem not to waken [her] love three times forms the conclusion, ii. 6 f.; iii. 5; viii. 3 f. So the summons to the lover to spring over the mountains like a gazelle manifestly stands twice at the end of a section, ii. 17, comp. 8; and viii. 14. 5) The whole is permeated too by declarations on the part of the maiden concerning her relation to her lover which are couched in identical terms. Twice she says "My beloved is mine and I am his, who feeds among the roses," ii. 16; vi. 3; twice "I am sick of love," ii. 5; v. 8; and not only in iii. 1, 2, 3, 4, but as far back as i. 7 she calls her lover שאהבה נפשי "he whom my soul loves." Likewise the address of the chorus to the beloved runs in a uniform strain, i. 8; v. 9; vi. 1, "thou fairest among women."—The last of these arguments contains (as does also No. 1) a special refutation of REBENSTEIN's and SANDERS' objections to the genuineness or integrity of Ch. 3. What are regarded as well by these critics as by the rest of those who impugn the unity of this book, as repetitions or imitations by a later hand, are shown by a true insight into the dramatic composition of the whole to be the necessary repetition of certain characteristic formulas purposely made by the poet himself. And as well in this as in all other respects the final judgment passed by DELITZSCH, p. 6, upon the whole controversy respecting the unity and integrity of the Song of Solomon, seems to be abundantly justified: "He who has any perception whatever of the unity of a work of art in human discourse, will receive an impression of external unity from the Song of Solomon, which excludes all right to sunder any thing from it as of a heterogeneous character or belonging to different periods, and which compels to the conclusion of an internal unity, that may still remain an enigma to the Scripture exposition of the present, but must nevertheless exist." Comp. also VAIHINGER, der Prediger und das Hohelied, p. 258 f.

REMARK 3. In respect to the poetic and artistic form of the Song of Solomon, provided its unity is admitted, and due regard is paid to the dialogue character of the discourse, there are on the whole but two views, that can possibly be entertained, that it is an idyl or bucolic carmen amœbœum, and that it is a proper drama though with a prevailing lyric and erotic character. The former supposition was adopted by some of the older interpreters mentioned by CARPZOV, Introd. in libros canonicos V. T., and after them by L. HUG ("das Hohelied in einer noch unversuchten Deutung," 1813, and "Schutzschrift" 1816), who urges in its favor the rural and pastoral character of most of the scenes and the prevalence of the same form of alternate discourse between two lovers. He has, however, remained almost alone among modern students of the Old Test. in this opinion as well as in the allegorical and political explanation of the Song connected with it, as though it were a colloquy between the ten tribes of Israel and the King of Judah. Only another catholic, HERBST (Einleitung in's A. T., edited by WELTE, 1842) substantially agrees with him; and the idyllic form of the whole as a group of twelve songs or scenes is likewise maintained by A. HEILIGSTEDT in his continuation of MAURER's Commentar. Gramm. Crit. in V. T., (IV. 2, 1848). The decisive consideration against this idyllic hypothesis* is the constant change of scene in the Song, the frequent transfer of the locality from the country to the city, and from Solomon's palace to Shulamith's homestead, also the repeated change of actors and the unequal length of the intervals of time between the several scenes. All these peculiarities are foreign to the nature of the idyl or pastoral poem, and agree better with the view that the Song is a proper drama. The dialogue scenes, separated in time and place, are closely connected together by their common reference to one and the same loving relation; and with a strict maintenance of the characters introduced, though without a proper plot, they visibly depict the historical progress of the relation between a royal lover and his beloved raised from an humble position to princely splendor and exaltation. No essential characteristic of dramatic composition is wanting in this poem: from beginning to end it contains conversations between two or more persons alternating with monologues or with narrations of what had been said by others; a chorus of the daughters of Jerusalem accompanies the whole progress of the action and takes part in it; the several scenes are more or less plainly separated from one another, and at certain principal points, at least, are distinguished by the recurrence of final or initial refrains. Only we must not go so far in maintaining the dramatic character of the piece as to allege with EWALD (d. poet. Bücher des A. Bds. 2 Aufl. 1866, I. 73 ff.) that it was actually designed for public representation, or even with BÖTTCHER ("die ältesten Bühnendichtungen," Leipz., 1850; and "Neue exegetisch-krit. Aehrenlese" 3. Abtheil. 1865, p. 76 ff.) and RENAN (Le Cantique des Cantiques, p. 83 ff.) that it was actually exhibited in the form of a play to be sung and accompanied by mimic acting, that is to say, in the style of the Sicilian-Dorian mimes, the Etruscan fescennines, the Campanian and old Roman fabulæ Atellanæ, etc. In opposition to such an exaggeration of the dramatical view into the grossly realistic, HITZIG's remark (das Hohelied erklärt, etc., p. 7,) continues in force almost without limitation. "If the piece actually came upon the stage it would be necessary for a speaker, where the language of other parties was introduced into the midst of his own, to change his voice so as actually to imitate the voices of others, and not to leave this distinction to the imagination merely: but the cases occur too frequently (ii. 10–15; v. 2, 3; vi. 10; vii. 1,) and the matter appears quite too complicated for this to be credible. The author would also assume the place of the chorus, and take part himself in the play; v. 1 b, (??—see against this improbable view § 2, Remark 1, p. 8); but then the piece also ceases to be objective to him, i. e., to be a drama to him. The poem certainly has a dramatic structure; but ii. 8 already proves that the author has not the power to continue in so objective an attitude, and he slides into the more convenient path of description and narration. The action is often hidden behind an imperfect dialogue; and this is easily superseded by a prolonged discourse requiring no answer; or if one is made, it is slim and scanty (vii. 11; iv. 16). Finally one may well ask, if the piece were actually performed, what would be its moral effect, which must have been foreseen, and therefore intended? Would not vii. 2–10 represented on the stage have transferred the illicit desires * of the speaker to the soul of the spectators? How could the sensuality of the auditor excited by iv. 9, 10, 12 ff., be prevented from taking fire even in an extra-nuptial direction? The Song of Solomon is a drama which the poet saw in the spirit, as the apocalyptic (prophets) Daniel and John had a series of scenes pass before their spiritual eye."—DELITZSCH, too, emphasizes in opposition to BÖTTCHER's view of the mimic performance of the Song of Solomon in the form of a rude and "unenviable" stage play of the times of the Israelitish kings, the ideal character of its artistic and dramatic form, and the morally pure and elevated spirit which it manifestly breathes from beginning to end. He puts it, herein following the lead of LOWTH (de sacra poesi Hebr. præl. 30 ff., and EWALD (Poet. B., 1st. edit., I. 40 ff., Comp. 2d edit., I. 73) as a representative of the sacred comedy of the Old Test., beside the book of Job as the chief product of the tragic art of the O. T. people of God. This designation may be allowed to pass as appropriate in the general, and not liable to be misunderstood. Nevertheless the essential character of the artistic form employed in this composition seems to be more accurately designated by the expression "melodrama" (v. AMMON) or lyrico-dramatic poetry, inasmuch as the relation of this form to that of the book of Job (as the epico-dramatic, or didactic-dramatic) is thus not only strikingly brought out, but also those defects and imperfections pointed out in the passage cited above from Hitzig in the carrying out of the dramatic form, which is often exchanged for the purely lyric, are thus accounted for.

§ 2. CONTENTS AND DIVISIONS (CONSTITUTION) OF THE SONG OF SOLOMON.

The Song of Solomon begins with a responsive Song between the chorus of the daughters of Jerusalem and Shulamith, a simple country maid from Shulem or Shunem * in the north of Palestine (see vii. 1) who, for her beauty, was chosen by Solomon to be his bride, and brought to the royal palace in Jerusalem. With plain and lovely discourse, corresponding to the artless disposition of an unspoiled child of nature, she avows both her ardent love for her royal bridegroom, and her longing for her native fields, whose spicy freshness and simpler style of life she prefers to the haughty splendor of court life, and especially to being associated with the great number of ladies in the royal palace (these are the daughters of Jerusalem), i. 2–8. These feelings of love and of home-sickness which simultaneously assail her heart, she hereupon expresses likewise to Solomon himself, with whom, after the exit of the chorus of those ladies, she is left alone in the "house of wine," one of the inmost rooms of the palace, i. 9—ii. 7.—Returned to her country home (and this, it would appear, with the approval of her royal lover), she finds herself still more ardently in love with him, and reveals her longing for a union with him ii. 8—iii. 5, by relating two episodes from the previous history of their love, viz., their first meeting (ii. 9–14) and a subsequent search for him, and finding him again (iii. 1–4).—Not long after the king really comes out for her, and has her brought home with great pomp and princely honors as his royal spouse. Her festive entry into the royal palace excites the admiring curiosity, astonishment, and enthusiasm of the inhabitants of Jerusalem (iii. 6–11). The cordial love, which her newly married husband shows her, makes her forget her home-sickness, and causes her to enter with her whole heart into the rapturous rejoicings of the wedding feast (iv. 1—v. 1). But the heaven of her happiness is soon darkened anew. A distressing dream (v. 2–7) mirrors to her the loss, nay the desertion of her husband; and soon after the way in which he mentions his numerous concubines, with whom she is to share his love (vi. 8), in the midst of his caresses and flattering speeches (vi. 4–9) shows her that she can never feel happy in the voluptuous whirl of his court life already degenerated into the impure. Hence her longing for the quiet and innocent simplicity of her rural home is awakened more strongly than ever before, and drives her to entreat her lover to remove thither with her altogether, that as at once a husband and a brother, he may belong exclusively to her (v. 2—viii. 4). Overcome by her charms and loveliness, Solomon yields and grants her her humble request to become a plain shepherdess and vinedresser again, instead of a queen surrounded by pomp and splendor. He even takes part in the merry sport and innocent raillery with which she pleases herself in her old accustomed way in the circle of her brothers and sister (one little sister and several grown up brothers), and joins in the spirited encomium upon the all-conquering and even death-exceeding power of wedded love and fidelity (viii. 6–8), by which, with a thankful heart, she celebrates her return home (viii. 5–14).

This simple action, almost entirely free from exciting complications and contrasts, is divided by the poet into five acts, of which the next to the last (v. 2—viii. 4) is in striking contrast with the rest from its disproportionate length, but yet cannot well be divided into two, because no proper point of division can be found either at vi. 9, 10, or at vii. 1. Instead of the number six, maintained by Delitzsch, we shall, therefore, with Ewald, Böttcher and others have to affirm the existence of five principal scenes or sections of the piece. And in substantial adherence to the only correct view of the aim and constitution of the whole as given by Delitzsch, we shall have to assign the following characteristic titles or statements of contents to these five acts:—1) Chap. i. 2—ii. 7. The first time the lovers were together at the royal palace in (or near) Jerusalem. 2) Chap. ii. 8—iii. 5. The first meeting of the lovers, related by Shulamith, who has returned to her home. 3) Chap. iii. 6—v. 1. The solemn bringing of the bride, and the marriage at Jerusalem. 4) Chap. v. 2—viii. 4. Shulamith's longing reawakened for her home. 5) chap. viii. 5-14. The return home and the triumph of the chaste love of the wife over the unchaste feelings of her royal husband.*

REMARK 1. According to the ordinary erotic and historical interpretation of the Song of Solomon, as it has been developed particularly by UMBREIT, EWALD, HITZIG, VAIHINGER and RENAN, after the previous suggestions of JACOBI, AMMON, STÄUDLIN, etc., (comp. § 6) Shulamith is in love not with Solomon, but with a young shepherd of her country home, from whom the wanton king, after getting her in his harem by force or fraud (i. 4; comp. vi. 11, 12) seeks to alienate her by all sorts of inducements and seductive arts. But the maid, by her pure love to her quondam playmate, resists all the enticements which the king brings to bear upon her, partly through the medium of the ladies of his court, and partly in person by his own flattering speeches and several times by direct and violent assaults upon her virtue (e. g., iv. 9 ff.; vii. 2-10). Convinced of the fidelity of her devotion to her distant lover Solomon is at length obliged to dismiss her to her home, whither according to STÄUDLIN, RENAN and HITZIG she is taken by her affianced, who has meanwhile hastened to her on the wings of love (vii. 12 ff.—?), whilst UMBREIT, EWALD and others prefer to leave it undecided how she returned from Jerusalem to Shulem, and conceive of her in viii. 5 ff. as suddenly and in some unexplained way transported again to the environs of her home and to the side of her lover.—This view, according to which the whole is to be regarded as a "tribute of praise to an innocence which withstands every allurement," as a "song of praise to a pure, guileless, faithful love, which no splendor can dazzle, and no flattery ensnare" (EWALD), seems to be chiefly favored by some expressions of Shulamith in chap. i., as well as here and there in what follows, which at first sight have the look of passionate exclamations to her distant lover; so particularly i. 4, "Draw me after thee, then we will run," and i. 7, "O tell me, thou whom my soul loveth, where feedest thou?" etc. Comp. also iv. 16; v. 10; vi. 2, etc. But everything is much simpler both in these passages and generally in the whole poem, if Shulamith's avowals of love are in all cases referred to the king himself, and accordingly the object of her longing as expressed, e. g., in i. 6 f.; ii. 1, 3 ff.; vi. 11, 12; vii. 12 ff., is conceived to be not an absent lover, but only the peaceful quiet and beauty of her country home. This ardent longing, or rather the childlike simplicity and humility which are at the bottom of it, lead her to think of her royal lover himself as though he were a shepherd of her native fields, and to describe all his acts and movements, his plans and occupations, by expressions drawn

* [We cannot but concede to this scheme the praise of great ingenuity, particularly in the form originally proposed by DELITZSCH, which was free from some of the objections that lie against it as modified by ZÖCKLER. And yet it cannot have escaped attention that the uniting links are throughout supplied by the interpreter and not found in the Song itself. It is at best but a plausible hypothesis, and it only requires the application of like ingenuity to devise any number of others materially differing from it, yet equally entitled to regard. The story suggested above is, after all, only a romance of the modern commentator with the elements of the Song woven in to suit his convenience or his taste.

There would be no serious objection, perhaps, to this or any other fanciful combination of the statements or intimations of the poem, if it were not for the bias it creates in the mind of the interpreter, however unconscious he may be of it, and the temptation to which it subjects him to explain every thing in harmony with his preconceived scheme. The return home between ii. 7 and 8, the marriage ceremony between chap. iii. and iv., the desire to return home in vii. 11, etc., etc., must all be supplied. That the temporary interruption of the loving relation between the bridegroom and his bride was due to the inconstancy of the former (one of the modifications by ZÖCKLER, which is certainly not an improvement) is not only purely imaginary, but at variance with the evident suggestions of the book, e. g., v. 3, and leads to a distortion of its whole idea. What is figurative in the Song, and what is literal in its primary application, is also determined mainly by the exigencies of the scheme with which the interpreter sets out. Thus ZÖCKLER, who views the bride as a country maiden, insists on the strict literality of all that is said of her rural occupations or pleasures, while admitting that the pastoral employments of the king i. 7 are only figurative, and explains away the statement vii. 1 that she is a prince's daughter. They, who identify the bride with the daughter of Pharaoh, urge the literality of vii. 1, and convert her vineyard, etc., into figures. WITHINGTON in favor of his notion that she is a Sheikh's daughter and bred in rural life, claims that there is no figure in either case, since both may be adjusted in their literal sense in his hypothesis.

The numerous and persistent attempts to discover a regular plot or a consecutive story in the Song of Solomon, have thus far failed so signally, that the words of THRUPP in the present state of the question at least, seem to be justified: "It is indeed only by constraint that the Song can be viewed as a drama conforming to the rules of outward dramatic unity." It is one continuous composition, preserving throughout the same theme, the love of king Solomon and his bride, the image of a divine and spiritual love. But the scenes portrayed and the displays of mutual fondness indulged seem to be grouped rather than linked. They stand forth in their distinctness as exquisitely beautiful and reflecting as much light on each other and on the subject which they illustrate and adorn, as though they had been gathered up into the artificial unity of a consecutive narration or a dramatic plot. And this looser method of arrangement or aggregation with its abrupt transitions and sudden changes of scene, is no less graceful and impressive, while it is more in harmony with the oriental mind and style of composition generally, than the rigorous, external and formal concatenation which the more logical but less fervid Indo-European is prone to demand.—TR.]

from rural and pastoral life (see i. 7, 13, 14, 17; ii. 3 ff., 8 ff., 16 f.; v. 10 ff.; vi. 2 f.). She continues this until her eager desires are finally granted, and her royal lover, vanquished by the power and sincerity of her love, follows her to her quiet home, leaving all the luxurious splendor and voluptuousness of his court in order to live as a shepherd among shepherds, and "like a roe or a young hart on the mountains of spices" (viii. 14) to participate in the innocent amusements of Shulamith and her brothers and sister. This happy decision is brought about mainly by the glowing earnestness of Shulamith's language in vii. 10 ff., in which her love for Solomon and her homesickness are both most strongly and most movingly expressed. Several things in this address of hers are unaccountable upon any other view of the whole than that which is here presented, especially the wish "O that thou wert to me as a brother," etc. (viii. 1), and likewise the exhortation "Come my beloved, let us go into the country," etc. (vii. 12). And many previous expressions of Shulamith, as i. 12; ii. 4; iv. 16, testify, with a clearness not to be mistaken, her loving consent to Solomon's suit, and therefore cannot without forcing be reconciled with the ordinary profane-erotic explanation. It must in particular be regarded as extremely forced when EWALD regards the passage iv. 8—v. 1 as a monologue of Shulamith in which she describes the plighted love of her distant lover, while nothing is clearer than that the familiar colloquy of the bridal pair on their wedding day, which begins with iv. 1, is continued in this section, (comp. DELITZSCH, p. 33 f.). Several of the assumptions, by which HITZIG tries to bolster up his peculiar modifications of the profane-erotic interpretation are quite as arbitrary, e. g. the assertion that ii. 7; iii. 5; viii. 4, is the language not of Shulamith but of the poet, who here undertakes to perform the part of the chorus, addressed to the "daughters of Jerusalem" just as in v. 1 b also the poet "puts himself forward" (! ?); the intolerable harshness of regarding vi. 8 as an expression of the vexation at the coy beauty, with which Solomon turns away from her and back again to the ladies of his court who are ready for every kind of indulgence; the opinion that in vii. 2-10 Solomon makes a declaration of love not to Shulamith, but to some one of his concubines, and that in a vulgar and indecent way; the assumption that Shulamith's country lover was present in Jerusalem, not only from vii. 11, but from iv. 6 onward, and was engaged in the business of taking his affianced home from the royal harem, etc. RENAN, who follows HITZIG in the main has endeavored to extend some of these assumptions in a peculiar way, e. g., by the assertion that the shepherd beloved by Shulamith, and who hastens to release her from the royal harem, already comes upon the scene in ii. 2; by the romantic idea that the same languishing shepherd utters the words iv. 8-15 "at the foot of the tower of the Seraglio," in which his beloved is confined, is then (iv. 16) admitted by her and enraptured exclaims to the chorus the words v. 1 b.; by the fantastic assumption that when finally released she is carried home asleep by her lover, and laid under an apple tree, where she then viii. 5 f., awakes, etc. The like, only in some respects more whimsical in BÖTTCHER, die ältesten Bühnendichtungen, etc. The wide divergence between these leading advocates of the view which we are opposing, and that in so many and by no means unimportant particulars, must give rise to misgivings with regard to the tenability of that fundamental conception which they have in common. Numerous other discrepancies between them as well as between the critics most nearly akin to them will meet us in the course of the detailed exegesis, and will confirm from the most diverse quarters the impossibility of carrying consistently through the hypothesis of two rival lovers of Shulamith in any of its phases.* The view advocated by us cannot, it is true, attain to absolute certainty, such as

* [THRUPP thus exposes the want of agreement among the advocates of this extraordinary hypothesis: "We find that the passage i. 15 is assigned by GINSBURG to the shepherd, by HITZIG and RENAN to Solomon; ii. 2 is assigned by GINSBURG and RENAN to the shepherd, but by HITZIG to Solomon; GINSBURG makes the shepherd the speaker in iv. 1-6, and ver. 7 to middle of 16, with part of v. 1, but RENAN gives iv. 1-7 to Solomon, the remainder of the above to the shepherd, while HITZIG gives iv. 1-5, 7, 9, 10, 12, etc., to Solomon, 6, 8, 11 to the shepherd; vi. 8 is given to Solomon by GINSBURG and HITZIG but to the shepherd by RENAN; vi. 9 is given to Solomon by GINSBURG, but to the shepherd by HITZIG and RENAN. How little value is attached by GINSBURG himself to his own argument may be gathered from the circumstance that whereas he assigns iv. 1-5 to the shepherd, he yet, when this passage is partially repeated in vi. 5-7; vii. 3, puts the identical words into the mouth of Solomon. It is clear that he sees no fundamental difference in the language which his two male characters use. And it is not pretended that they ever address each other; nor indeed is there a single passage in which, according to any probable interpretation, they are both addressed or spoken of together. The distinction between them is in fact purely fictitious; there is but one male character in the song, the true beloved."

In regard to the introduction of new and imaginary speakers, which has been carried to such extravagant excess by HITZIG, the same able writer pertinently remarks: "It is evident that sufficient ingenuity might make a complicated shall be perfectly satisfactory in all respects, because the absence of titles to the several acts, as well as to the parts of each particular person, makes a reliable distribution of the action amongst the several parties impossible in many cases; and because, unfortunately, no old and credible accounts of the original meaning and origin of the poem, that is to say no correct explanatory scholia are in existence. Thus much, however, can be established with a high degree of probability that among the various historical explanations of this drama that which is here attempted by us as a modification of that of DELITZSCH harmonizes particularly well at once with the contents of the piece ascertained in an unprejudiced manner, and with its composition by Solomon, which is attested by tradition and by internal considerations; on which account it is to be preferred to the historical explanation of v. HOFMANN, which is kindred to it in many respects. (He identifies the bride of the song with Pharaoh's daughter,* celebrated in Ps. xlv., and takes the poem to be a celebration of the marriage of Solomon and this Egyptian princess, moving in figures drawn from the life of shepherds and vintagers). See further particulars concerning and in opposition to this exposition of HOFMANN in DELITZSCH, p. 37 ff.; and comp. § 4 below.

REMARK 2.—The opinions of different interpreters also diverge considerably in respect to the limits of the several scenes and acts or songs, whilst the piece itself does not furnish certain criteria enough to verify either one view or another. Most of the recent writers agree in assuming about ten or twelve scenes; but less unanimity prevails in regard to the question how these shorter scenes are to be apportioned among the larger acts, and how many such acts are to be assumed. HITZIG altogether despairs of reducing the nine "scenes" affirmed by him to a smaller number of acts. DELITZSCH, HAHN, and WEISSBACH number six acts with two scenes each. EWALD (after giving up the assumption of four acts previously maintained in his commentary of 1826) and with him BÖTTCHER, RENAN, VAIHINGER and many others make five acts among which they variously distribute the thirteen to fifteen scenes which they assume. E. F. FRIEDRICH reckons four acts with ten scenes. And finally VON HOFMANN assumes but three principal divisions of about the same length (i. 2—iii. 5; iii. 6—v. 16; vi. 1—viii. 12) to which he supposes a brief conclusion of but two verses (viii. 13, 14) to be appended. The assumption of five acts might be recommended in the general by the consideration that the action of any drama by a sort of necessity passes through five main steps or stages in its progress to its consummation; whence we see Greek dramas invariably, and the old Indian at least prevailingly divided into that number of acts, and the dialogue portion of the book of Job, the other chief product of the dramatic art in the Old Testament besides the Song of Solomon, is most clearly separated into five divisions (comp. EWALD, d. Dichter d. A. Bds., I. 69; DELITZSCH, d. B., Job, p. 12, in the "Bibl. Commentar." by KEIL and DEL.). To this may be added that judging by the quintuple division of the Song of Solomon found in some old Ethiopic versions, the Sept. which is at the basis of these versions would seem to have divided the book into that number of sections (EWALD, Bibl. Jahrb., 1849, p. 49), and that exegetical tradition, in so far as it gives manifold testimony even in the patristic period (e. g., ORIGEN, JEROME) to the dramatic character of this piece, likewise confirms, though indirectly, its separation into the five customary divisions of every drama. Against the assumption made by DELITZSCH and HAHN of six acts may be further urged in particular that the assertion on which it is based that the larger act v. 2—viii. 4 is plainly divided into two acts by the recurrence in vi. 10 of the admiring question מי זאת וגו from iii. 6 is certainly unfounded, because this question is here manifestly only a statement of cross-dialogue of this kind out of almost anything; each difficulty that might arise, would only require at most one additional complication, or one additional speaker." Nevertheless this extreme is a natural sequence of the method adopted. If the lover may be divided into two, why not the beloved, and why may not each resulting character be subdivided again, a process which must very soon furnish, and in fact in HITZIG's and RENAN's hands may be regarded as having already furnished its own reductio ad absurdum.—TR.].

* [This idea has been a favorite one with English Commentators. The book bears this heading in Matthew's Bible: "Solomon made this ballad or song by himself and his wife the daughter of Pharaoh, under the shadow of himself figuring Christ and under the person of his wife the church." And among the more recent expositors, WORDSW.: "It is probable that the marriage of Solomon with Pharaoh's daughter may have given occasion to the composition of the forty-fifth Psalm and also of the Canticles." So HARMER (Outlines, p. 27 ff.), LIGHTFOOT (Chronology of Old Test. in his Works, I. p. 76), TAYLOR (Fragments appended to Calmet, No. 345 ff.) and with more or less confidence many others. It is expressly controverted by GILL (who finds a chronological difficulty in vii. 4, comp. 1 Kin. vi. 38; vii. 1, 2), PERCY (who argues from iii. 4, 10; viii. 2, 8, 12), THRUPP, WEISS, (who urges the incongruities of the literal hypothesis generally, and especially i. 5, 6; iv. 8; v. 2, etc.), MOODY STUART (who adds to the preceding i. 7, 14; vii. 4) and others.—TR.].

what was thought and said by the women mentioned in the preceding verse, and is therefore most closely connected with ver. 9, as this with ver. 8 of the same chapter (comp. the exeget. explanations in loc.). A separation of what is certainly a disproportionately long section v. 2—viii. 4, into two or more of similar size seems on the whole to be impracticable on account of the uniformity and continuity of its contents, and we shall for this reason have to assume that the five acts enumerated above in the text of this section are probably the original ones; especially as there can be no doubt of the correctness of the points of division assumed by DELITZSCH in substantial agreement with EWALD (ii. 7; iii. 5; viii. 4—in each case the well known refrain: "I adjure you, ye daughters of Jerusalem," etc.). We differ in this division from EWALD and BÖTTCHER only in that we make the third act end with v. 1, because EWALD's assertion that this characteristic concluding verse "I adjure you, etc.," has been dropped after v. 8, cannot be proved, and the attaching of v. 2-7 to the third act appears on the whole inappropriate (as was also seen by RENAN). Our division is distinguished from that of RENAN by the different compass which it assigns to the last two acts, of which the fourth extends according to him from v. 2 to vi. 3, the fifth from vi. 3 to viii. 7, and finally viii. 8–14 is a small appendix or epilogue—all this in virtue of the strangest and most forced assumptions, which will be remarked upon as far as is necessary in the detailed interpretation. On the compass and limits of the scenes, into which the five acts are again divided, we shall have to treat in connection with the detailed exegesis.*

BOSSUET suggested the idea that successive portions of the Song of Solomon were designed to be sung on each of the sev-

§ 3.—DATE AND AUTHOR OF THE SONG OF SOLOMON.

That Canticles was composed in the age of Solomon as the flourishing period of the Old Testament Chokmah-literature may be argued not only from manifold indications of the affinity between its ethical tendency and view of the world and those of Solomon's collection of proverbs, but chiefly from the certainty with which its author deals with all that is connected with the history of the Solomonic period; the exuberant prosperity and the abundance of native and foreign commodities whose existence he assumes in Israel at that time, and the remarkably rich round of figures and comparisons from nature which is everywhere at his command in his descriptions. And that this author is no other than Solomon himself is shown by the extensive knowledge which he exhibits throughout the entire poem of remarkable and rare objects from all of the three kingdoms of nature, and by which he may be most unmistakably recognized as that wise and well-informed king, who was able to speak "of trees from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; also of beasts and of fowl and of creeping things and of fishes," 1 Kin. v. 13 (iv. 33). Solomon's authorship is likewise confirmed by the equal acquaintance which the poet shows with all parts of the land of Israel; the easy and familiar way, indicating not only accurate knowledge but royal possession and ownership, in which he speaks of horses in Pharaoh's chariot (i. 9), of wood from Lebanon (iii. 9), of en days, during which the marriage festival lasted. PERCY, WILLIAMS, and TAYLOR (in fragments to CALMET'S Dictionary of the Bible) base their divisions of the book on this conception. Thus:

	BOSSUET.	PERCY.
1st Day	i. 2—ii. 6	i. 2—ii. 7.
2d Day	ii. 7-17	ii. 8—iii. 5.
3d Day	iii. 1—v. 1	iii. 6—iv. 7.
4th Day	v. 2—vi. 9	iv. 8—v. 1.
5th Day	vi. 10—vii. 11	v. 2—vi. 10.
6th Day	vii. 12—viii. 3	vi. 11—viii. 4.
7th Day	viii. 4-14	viii. 5-14.

WILLIAMS.

1st Day—morning	i. 2-8	evening i. 9-14
2d Day "	i. 15—ii. 7	" ii. 8-17.
3d Day "	iii. 1-5	" iii. 6-11.
4th Day "	iv. 1-6	" iv. 7—v. 1.
5th Day "	v. 2—vi. 3	" vi. 4-13.
6th Day "	vii. 1-10	" vii. 11—viii. 4.
7th Day "	viii. 5-7	" viii. 8-14.

TAYLOR supposes the several "eclogues" to be sung on six days, and before the marriage ceremony instead of after it. He divided the book thus:

1st Day—morning	i. 2-8	evening i. 9—ii. 7.
2d Day "	ii. 8-17	" iii. 1-5.
3d Day "	iii. 6—iv. 6	" iv. 7—v. 1.
4th Day "	v. 2—vi. 3	" vi. 4-13.
5th Day "	vii. 1-5	" vii. 6—viii. 4.
6th Day "	(after the marriage ceremony)	viii. 5-14.

MOODY STUART divides the book as is done by ZÖCKLER, but entitles the sections differently:

CANTICLE I. i. 2—ii. 7 The bride seeking and finding the king.
II. ii. 8—iii. 5 The sleeping bride awakened.
III. iii. 6—v. 1 The bridegroom with the bride.
IV. v. 2—viii. 4 The bridegroom's withdrawal and reappearance, and the bride's glory.
V. viii. 5-14 The little sister.

DAVIDSON and GINSBURG, adherents of the shepherd-hypothesis, follow the same division.

THRUPP adopts substantially the same, only subdividing the fourth and last sections, thus

1. i. 2—ii. 7 The anticipation.
2. ii. 8—iii. 5 The awaiting.
3. iii. 6—v. 1 The espousal and its results.
4. v. 2-8 The absence.
5. v. 9—viii. 4 The presence.
6. viii. 5-12 Love's triumph.
viii. 13, 14 Conclusion.

the tower in Lebanon looking toward Damascus (vii. 5), of the pools of Heshbon and the forests of Carmel (vii. 5, 6), the tents of Kedar and the mountains of Gilead (i. 5; iv. 1), of the beauty of Tirzah and the loveliness of Jerusalem (vi. 4; comp. iv. 4), etc. The peculiarities in the language of the poem, rightly estimated, likewise testify rather in favor of than against Solomon's authorship. For the Aramæisms and apparent traces of later usage, which it presents, are, like similar phenomena in the Song of Deborah, in the Book of Job, in the prophet Amos, etc., to be attributed entirely to its highly poetical character. And the occurrence in individual cases of foreign non-Semitic words (e. g. פַּרְדֵּס iv. 13, אַפִּרְיוֹן iii. 9), if this were actually proven, would be least surprising in a writer of such many-sided learning and of so universal a turn of mind as Solomon. And finally the contents of the piece are of such a nature as not only to admit but actually to favor the supposition that Solomon is the author, provided that in ascertaining these contents we discard the common assumption of the profane-erotic exegesis that this king is introduced as the seducer of the innocence of a country maid who adheres with steadfast fidelity to her betrothed. For the fundamental thought set forth above (§ 2, p. 6) in opposition thereto, of a purifying influence proceeding from Shulamith's devoted love upon the heart of the king, already partly tainted by the sensuality of polygamy and the voluptuous manners of the harem, harmonizes very well with the reference of the poem to Solomon;* especially as the mention of the sixty queens and the eighty concubines compared with the numbers stated in 1 Kings xi. 3 as belonging to his later years, seven hundred queens and three hundred concubines, points to an earlier period in the life of this king as the date of the poem, a time when his many wives had not yet ensnared his heart in unhallowed passion, nor "turned him away after strange gods" to the extent that this took place shortly before his death, 1 Kings xi. 4. It is, therefore, Solomon, when he had not yet sunk to the lowest stage of polygamous and idolatrous degeneracy, but was still relatively pure, and at any rate was still in full possession of his rich poetic productivity 1 Kings v. 12 (iv. 32) whom we must suppose to have been the author of this incomparably beautiful and graceful lyrico-dramatic work of art, in which he on the one hand extols the virtue of his charming wife, and on the other humbly confesses his own resistance at first to the purifying influence proceeding from her.

On this view, therefore, the statement of the title (i. 1), which, though post-Solomonic [?], is yet very ancient and certainly prior to the closing of the Canon, is justified as perfectly true historically; and it is unnecessary, for the sake of setting aside the direct Solomonic origin of the poem, to give to לִשְׁלֹמֹה, in violation of the laws of the language and of the constant usage of לְ in the superscriptions to the Psalms, the explanation, "in reference to Solomon," or "in the style of Solomon." to which e. g. UMBREIT, following the lead of some older commentators like COCCEIUS, shows himself inclined (perhaps also the Septuag. with its translation: 'Αισμα 'ᾳσμάτων, ὅ ἐστιν τῷ Σαλωμῶν).†

WEISS, according to his historico-prophetic scheme, divides the book into three parts, as related to three successive divine manifestations, together with a conclusion, thus:

1. i. 2—ii. 7 The dedication of the tabernacle.
2. ii. 8—iii. 5 The dedication of Solomon's temple.
3. iii. 6—viii. 4 The advent of Christ.

viii. 5–14 Conclusion.

BURROWES also divides into three parts, viz.:

1. i. 2—ii. 7 Successive manifestations of divine love to the believing soul.
2. ii. 8—vii. 9 Motives to allure the soul from the world to Christ.
3. vii. 10—viii. 14 Effects produced by these manifestations and motives].

* [The discredit, which ZÖCKLER's hypothesis unwarrantably casts upon Solomon as exhibited in this Song, plainly tends so far as it goes to encumber unnecessarily the question of his authorship.—TR.]

† [WEISS (and more doubtfully PATRICK, AINSWORTH and GILL) translates, "concerning Solomon," conceiving that it is a heavenly and not an earthly personage, who is so designated in this verse as well as in the rest of the Song. NOYES (on the ground of i. 4, 5; iii. 6-11; vii. 5; viii. 11, 12) and THRUPP deny that it was written by Solomon. The former supposes "Canticles to have been written by some Jewish poet either in the reign of Solomon or soon after it." THRUPP objects that Solomon was not fitted by his training to appreciate or depict a pure and holy love; the absence of any allusion to the temple; the typical use made of the figure of Solomon; the mention of Tirzah, vi. 4; certain passages upon which he has put fanciful interpretations, e. g. i. 15, from which he infers that "Jerusalem was no longer the religious metropolis of the whole nation;" iv. 4, "the shields of several successive generations of warriors;" ii. 15, foxes ravaging the REMARK 1. The position of the Song of Solomon in the literature of the Old Testament is thus defined by DELITZSCH (Section II., p. 9 ff.) as the result of a careful investigation: With the exception of some points of contact with Genesis (comp. e. g. vii. 11 with Gen. iii. 16; iv. 11 with Gen. xxvii. 27; viii. 6 with Gen. xlix. 7), it contains no references to the earlier writings of the Bible. Quite as little does it betray any close relationship in ideas or language with the Psalms of David or the Book of Job, the principal productions of the oldest lyric and dramatic literature of the Old Testament. But on the contrary it presents more numerous and significant instances of resemblance to or accordance with those sections of the Book of Proverbs, which date from the time next after Solomon, especially with Prov. i.–ix and xxii.–xxiv; and these are of such a nature as to assert its priority and the imitation of many of its ideas and expressions by the authors of those sections. The correctness of these observations, from which it follows at least that Canticles originated in the Solomonic period, can scarcely be impugned, in view especially of such manifest coincidences as that between Prov. v. 15 ff. and Cant. iv. 15, between Prov. vii. 17 and Cant. iv. 14, between Prov. v. 3 and Cant. iv. 11, between Prov. vi. 30, 31 and Cant. viii. 6, 7, between Prov. xxiii. 31 and Cant. vii. 10. More important, however, than these and like internal testimonies to the existence of the Song of Solomon in an epoch which at any rate was very near that of Solomon (comp. various other characteristic coincidences in individual expressions between this Song and the Proverbs collected by HENGSTENBERG, das Hohelied Salomo's, etc., p. 234 f., and HAEVERNICK, Einleit. I., 1, 211) are the indications which point directly to Solomon himself as the author, such as the Song contains in no small number. First of all, it moves among the historical relations of the time of David and Solomon with the utmost confidence. It knows the crown, with which Solomon was crowned by his mother Bathsheba on the day of his marriage (iii. 11), likewise his bed of state made of cedar wood from Lebanon (iii. 9, 10), and his sedan surrounded by sixty of the heroes of Israel (iii. 7); further, the tower of David hung with a thousand shields (iv. 4), the ivory tower of Solomon, as well as the watch-tower built on Lebanon toward Damascus (vii. 5). All these things, to which are to be added the "horses in Pharaoh's chariot," i. e. the chariot horses of the king imported from Egypt (i. 9; comp. 1 Kings x. 28, 29; 2 Chron. ix. 28); likewise Solomon's "sixty queens and eighty concubines" (vi. 8; comp. 1 Kings xi. 3); the royal vineyards at Engedi and at Baal-hamon (i. 14; viii. 11); the pools of Heshbon (vii. 5); Shenir, Hermon and Amana, peaks of Lebanon (iv. 8); the plain of Sharon and Mount Carmel (ii. 1; vii. 6), etc.—all this is taken in so ready a way from objects immediately at hand, and described upon occasion with such an accurate and thorough knowledge of the things themselves that we cannot deem the author of such descriptions to have been a subject or citizen of Solomon's kingdom or any other than this king himself, the possessor and ruler of the whole. And this especially for the reason that in the way in which the manifold beauties of nature and of art in the kingdom just mentioned are by bold comparisons and luxuriant figures employed to exalt the Shulamite, there is a manifest endeavor to connect whatever in it is grand and entrancing with the king's beloved and to represent the whole as personally concentrated as it were in her. That along with this Solomon is often mentioned in the third person and by name, that not unfrequently he is spoken of in a laudatory way, and once particularly (v. 10-16) the praise of his beauty is dwelt upon at length and in lavish terms from the mouth of his beloved—this can no more be regarded as disproving the authorship of Solomon, than it can be inferred from the mention of Tirzah along with Jerusalem in vi. 4 that the poem did not have its origin until after Solomon's death, in the time when the kingdoms were divided. For Tirzah was doubtless already under David and Solomon a city distinguished for its greatness and beauty, and was only made the royal residence in the northern kingdom by Jeroboam and his immediate successors (1 Kings xiv. 17; xv. 21; xvi.

vineyard of Israel would not be thought of in Solomon's prosperous reign; Ps. xlv., which is imitated in this Song "probably dates from the reign of Jehoshaphat." From these data, which are so intangible as not to require and scarcely to admit of refutation, he infers that the "Song of songs was probably composed about a century or more after the death of Solomon by a member of one of the prophetical schools in the kingdom of the ten tribes." GINSBURG says: "The title of this poem designates Solomon as the author, but internal evidence is against it," that is to say, the explanation which he, in common with other advocates of the shepherd-hypothesis, puts upon it is inconsistent with its having been written by Solomon. But whether in this case the well accredited fact of Solomon's authorship must be given up or the untenable hypothesis must fall is another matter.—TR.]

8, 23), for the reason that it had previously attained to a highly flourishing condition and to great consequence, comp. Josh. xii. 24, where it already appears as an ancient city of the Canaanitish kings. The laudation of Solomon, however, like the frequent mention of his name is sufficiently explained by the dramatic constitution of the whole, which made it necessary for the royal poet to speak of himself as objectively as possible (comp. much that is similar in the Psalms of David, e. g., Ps. xx., xxi., cx., likewise in Ps. lxxii. by Solomon) and which in particular "unavoidably brought with it the mutual praise of the lover and his beloved" (DEL. p. 17). But a more emphatic testimony than any hitherto adduced, is borne in favor of Solomon himself as the author of the poem, by the extraordinarily developed appreciation of the beauties of nature which the singer exhibits at every point of his performance, and his fondness, which reminds us at once of 1 Kings v. 13 (iv. 33), for figures, tropes and similes highly imaginative in conception and in execution, and drawn from every realm of nature, particularly from animal and plant life. There are mentioned in this poem nearly twenty names of plants (אֱגוֹז nut, אֲהָלוֹת lignaloes, אֶרֶז cedar, חֲבַצֶּלֶת wild flower, חִטִּים wheat, כֹּפֶר cyprus-flower, כַּרְכֹּם crocus, לְבֹנָה frankincense, מֹר myrrh, נֵרְדְּ nard, רִמּוֹן pomegranate, שׁוֹשָׁן lily, תְּאֵנָה fig, תַּפּוּחַ apple, בְּרוֹת cypress, גֶּפֶן vine, דּוּדָאִים mandrakes, קָנֶה calamus, קִנָּמוֹן cinnamon), and almost as many names of animals (נְמֵרִים panthers, סוּסָה horse, עוֹרֵב raven, עִזִּים goats, עֹפֶר הָאַיָּלִים a young hart, אַיֶּלֶת הַשָּׂדֶה hind, שׁוּעָלִים foxes, תּוֹר turtle-dove, אֲרָיוֹת lions, גְּדִיּוֹת kids, יוֹנִים doves, צְבִי gazelle, רְחֵלִים sheep; comp. also שֵׁן ivory, which is named several times). And not a few of these names are Hapaxlegomena or like the names of valuable minerals (as שֵׁשׁ marble, תַּרְשִׁישׁ turquoise, סַפִּיר sapphire) which are also found here, occur but rarely in other books of the Old Testament. If we duly consider the small compass of the piece, in which such an abundance of names of remarkable natural objects is crowded together, and estimate besides the repeated occurrence of many of these names and the "various points of view under which they are contemplated (e. g. in the pomegranate, its pulp when cut, iv. 3; vi. 7; its buds, vi. 11; vii. 13; its juice, viii. 2)," we can scarcely help, in view of the fact that numerous internal and external indications point to the age of Solomon as the date of the Song, finding its author in Solomon himself, the renowned royal sage, whom the book of Kings (loc. cit.) praises as at once the greatest of natural philosophers and the most fertile composer of songs. Moreover the criterion afforded in vi. 8 for the more exact determination of the period of his life, in which Solomon composed this poem, must in no wise be overlooked. From a comparison of this passage with 1 Kings xi. 3 f. we can conclude with entire certainty that the period in question was that middle age of the king when his decline from his former sincere obedience to the commandments of the Lord had already begun, without having attained that depth of moral degeneracy which it subsequently reached. This was already substantially the opinion of GROTIUS in his Adnotat. in V. T. respecting the date and origin of the Song of Solomon (after those Jewish interpreters in Bereshith Rabba, Jalkut and Pesikta, who supposed that Canticles was composed by Solomon in his younger years*), only he (as also v. HOFMANN, see § 2 Remark 1) erroneously explained it of the marriage of Solomon with an Egyptian princess and mingled in many notions of its contents as referring to the mysteries of married life, which were offensive to the æsthetic and moral feelings of Christian readers. (Comp. DELITZSCH, p. 14, 55).

REMARK 2. The most considerable objections of modern critics against the Solomonic authenticity of Canticles are those which are drawn from its language. Yet no decisive argument against its genuineness can be constructed out of them, because the alleged traces of a later Aramæizing type of the language, which it presents, may all without exception be explained as characteristic of the poetic character of its diction. So, first of all, the abbreviated relative שֶׁ for אֲשֶׁר, which, though foreign to prose and to the semi-prosaic language of the gnomic poets of the earlier period, and on this account neither used by the author of the prosaic title to this book (comp. above, p. 1), nor even by Solomon in his proverbs (Prov. x. 1—xxii. 16, where as in the Proverbs generally the form אֲשֶׁר is invariably found), nevertheless occurs in several poems, of acknowledged antiquity, especially in the Song of Deborah, which is certainly pre-Solomonic (Judg. v. 7; עַד שַׁקַּמְתִּי דְּבוֹרָה), as well as in the book of Job (chap. xix. 29), which probably dates from the time of Solomon. The fact, that a part of the poetry designated as Solomon's in the canon, viz., the Proverbs and the 72d Psalm (which presents however some other coincidences in diction and expression with Canticles), uses the prosaic אֲשֶׁר, and this Song alone the highly poetic שֶׁ is entirely analogous to the circumstance that the prophet Jeremiah only makes use of this abbreviated form in his Lamentations (e. g. ii. 15 f.; iv. 9; v. 18), whilst his prophetic discourses, which often pass into the poetic, always have אֲשֶׁר only. It follows hence inevitably that שֶׁ is essentially poetic, while yet it is not necessarily adapted to all kinds of poetry; and for this very reason it cannot be regarded as a sign of the post-exilic origin of this poem. The same judgment precisely must be passed upon the form שַׁלָּמָה i. 7 (a combination of the confirmatory שׁ and the interrogative לָמָה, not a modification of the Aram. דלמא "perhaps"). Likewise the Aramæisms נָטַר for נָצַר (i. 6; viii. 11, 12), בְּרוֹת for ברוש (i. 17), סְתָו "winter" (ii. 11) are sufficiently explained from that preference for a recherché and highly poetical style of expression, which also led the poet to adopt the unusual forms שִׂפְתוֹת for שְׂפָתַי (iv. 3), מִדְבָּר for פֶּה (ibid.), רַעְיָה for רֵעָה (i. 9, 15; ii. 2. Comp. Ps. xlv. 15), גַּנִּים for גַּנּוֹת (iv. 15; vi. 2; viii. 13), and many more of the same sort; and consequently there is the less need for regarding them (with EWALD and some others) as idioms in the dialect of Northern Palestine,* and consequently as proofs that the poem originated in one of the northern tribes, whether before or after the division of the kingdom. Many peculiarities of language are also without doubt to be imputed to Solomon's cosmopolitan turn of mind and views of the world, which inclined him to introduce all the foreign artists and works of art that he possibly could into his kingdom (comp. 1 Kin. vii. 13 ff.; x. 11 ff.), and would also impel him to incorporate words from foreign lands into the not very copious language of Hebrew poetry. There may thus be referred to a foreign origin, if not exactly the names of plants נֵרְדְּ (comp. Sansc. naladâ, old Pers. narada), כַּרְכֹּם (Sansc. kunkuma, lat. curcuma), אֲהָלוֹת (Sansc. aguru or aghil), yet perhaps the expressions פַּרְדֵּס for "pleasure garden" (iv. 13) and אַפִּרְיוֹן for "royal litter" or "palanquin" (iii. 9), the former to the Indian pradêça "wall" (HITZIG), or to the Zend pairidaêza "mound of earth, wall" (according to SPIEGEL, HAUG, Ew., etc.), and the latter to the Sansc. paryâna "riding saddle" (not, as JEROME, and most recently MAGNUS and SCHLOTTMANN supposed, to the Greek φορεῖον). And yet even in the case of these two words a foreign origin is not demonstrable with absolute certainty, for פַּרְדֵּס might be an Aram. quadrilateral for פֶּרֶס, and of the same signification with פַּדָּן "plain, field," and אַפִּרְיוֹן a derivative from the root פָּרָה after the analogy of פִּדְיוֹן, etc., synonymous with the Aram. פּוּרְיָא "bed;" comp. DELITZSCH, p. 22–26. But even though the foreign origin of these expressions, and of many others besides, were to be regarded as made out, the possibility of Canticles having been composed by Solomon, or having at least originated in the time of Solomon, could not in any case be denied on this ground, or on that of its other linguistic peculiarities. And the less so, because so many other indications point to its origin in a much earlier period than e. g. that of the exile assumed by UMBREIT and others, or even that of the Greek domination assumed by HARTMANN (on the ground of אפריון φορεῖον, iii. 9). On the whole, the judgment expressed by HENGSTENBERG (Comm. p. 237 f.) in regard to the linguistic peculiarities of the Song of Solomon, still remains correct: "That the author is not dependent on the Aramæizing usage of later times, but is governed throughout by design and by free choice, is plain 1)" from the fact that with the exception of שׁ scarcely anything is to be found, which recurs again in the later usage of the language; the foreign forms are exclusively peculiar to the Song of Solomon"—(but here פַּרְדֵּס, which is also found, Eccles. ii. 5, is an exception) [that is, on the assumption in which ZÖCKLER and HENGSTENBERG concur, that Ecclesiastes was not written by Solomon, but belongs to a later age.—TR.]—2) "that the language has a youthful freshness, as in none of the products belonging to the times of a degenerate Hebrew." Comp. also DÖPKE, Hohel., p. 28 ff., EWALD, p. 16 ff., HITZIG, p. 8 ff. (who, however, like EWALD, gathers up the Aramæisms of the piece in a one-sided way in favor of his hypothesis that it belongs to the north of Palestine, and hence was not written by Solomon) and DELITZSCH, p. 19 ff.

§ 4. THE ETHICAL IDEA AND THE TYPICAL IMPORT OF THE SONG OF SOLOMON.

The conjugal love of Solomon and Shulamith, described in Canticles, has a significance beyond itself and its own times. As the love of the wise and glorious king of Israel to a plain, pure-minded and marvellously beautiful maiden from among his people, it mirrors forth the relation of Jehovah, the covenant God of the theocracy to the Old Testament people of God as His bride, and the chosen object of His love (comp. Hos. ii. 18, 21; Isa. liv. 5; lxii. 4, 5; Jer. ii. 2; iii. 1 ff.; iv. 30; xiii. 22, 26; xxx. 14; Ezek. xvi. 8, etc.), and is a prophecy of the far stronger, and more tender manifestation of His love, which God has condescended to bestow on all mankind in the times of the New Testament salvation. The love of Solomon to Shulamith is a type of the loving communion between Christ and His Church (John iii. 29; Mat. ix. 15, etc.), nay, a prophecy of that glorious culmination and final act in His loving union with it, which Paul, Eph. v. 31 f. designates as the "great mystery," which is to form the last and highest fulfilment of nature's sacred law of marriage (Gen. ii. 24: "For this cause shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh"). It is no objection to this assumption of a typical and Messianic character of the Song of Solomon, that the idea of conjugal or wedded love is not exhibited in it in unsullied moral purity, but impaired in various ways by the dark back-ground of polygamy, and that it is Solomon who appears as the guilty party, as the cause of this partial spoiling of the ideal substance of the action. For in spite of Solomon's sad degeneracy, which had already, by the time of the action described in this poem, seized upon his heart, once devoted beyond others to obedience to the word of God (see 1 Kin. iii. 9 ff.), and in spite of the merely temporary nature of his conversion wrought by Shulamith, which was afterwards followed by a still lower fall, he nevertheless is and remains one of the most distinguished types of the Messiah in the entire series of Old Testament prefigurations, as Christ's own comparison of His wisdom and glory with that of Solomon teaches us (Matt. xii. 42; comp. vi. 28). But Shulamith, the enchantingly beautiful daughter of the land of Israel, in whose fair body dwelt a still fairer soul, and among whose noble virtues a chaste but fondly loving heart, and an humble mind of child-like simplicity shone in the first rank—Shulamith appears as a striking type of the Church of Christ. And this becomes the more appropriate in proportion as the Church more and more plainly presents the figure of a maiden raised from a low condition to glorious communion with her royal bridegroom, and as her cordial, humble, loving attachment and adherence to her Lord, faithful unto death, such as she should manifest according to her true idea, and as she actually does manifest in growing measure in her true members, resembles the love of that plain shepherd's daughter to her royal lord and master. There is certainly this dissimilitude in the parallel, that the morally purifying, ennobling and delivering influence in the typical relation between Solomon and Shulamith, proceeds from the wife, while in the grand antitype, the formation of the new covenant by Christ, the redeeming and sanctifying agency belongs to the husband (comp. Eph. v. 25 ff.). But a partial discrepancy of this nature, or even contrast between the type and its prototype, is found in a greater or less degree in every prefiguration of the history of redemption; comp. the Old Testament parallel between Adam and Christ, Rom. v. 12 ff., between the termination of David's earthly life and that of Christ's, Acts xiii. 36, 37, between Jonah and the Lord, as a greater prophet than he, Matt. xii. 40. And furthermore, that very dissimilitude involves also an important resemblance, inasmuch as Christ's coming down to His people was one with the riches of heaven becoming poor, and one divinely glorious becoming a servant (2 Cor. viii. 9; Phil. ii. 6 ff.), induced thereto really by their mute waiting and supplication; and inasmuch as this being drawn by the power of a child-like confiding love, is repeated again and again between the Lord and every believing soul among His people, and shall be repeated to the end of time (John xiv. 23; Matt. xviii. 20; Rev. iii. 20).

It will constitute the task of the sections in this Commentary, which relate to the development of the doctrinal and ethical ideas, to point out in detail the peculiar combination of the typical by analogy, and the typical by contrast in the relations between the persons of this Song on the one hand, and Christ and His Church on the other. Shulamith will prevailingly appear to be an ethical, and Solomon a metaphysical type of Christ. The character of the former will offer an abundance of models for the direct imitation of Christians in their religious life, whilst her royal lover, by his position in the theocracy and in the history of redemption, and by the elevation to a dignity of equal distinction which he accords to the poor maiden will be a direct type of the Redeemer. The allegorical exegesis which fails to recognize or obliterates the partial contrast between him and the Saviour, or the attempt to make out the unconditional and thoroughly Messianic character of the piece at the expense of its historical truth, will find its refutation and correction step by step along with this Exposition.

REMARK 1.—That the fundamental thought of the Song of Solomon lies essentially in the praise of the joyful happiness of wedded love, that its mystery therefore is no other than the mystery of marriage (Eph. v. 31, 32), and that this its mystical idea is vividly presented in one of the most remarkable events of Solomon's life, which is of such great significance in the history of redemption,—this is the estimate put upon it, and the position accorded to it in Biblical Theology by DELITZSCH, and in substantial agreement with him by VON HOFMANN, and this we are convinced is the only correct one. The latter says (in a "Supplement" to DELITZSCH'S Hohe Lied, p. 237 f.): "Canticles is a song of love, which is here exhibited in all the fulness of its beauty, grace and power, richly adorned besides with the royal splendor of Solomon, and still in the purity and chastity of the marriage bond. As opposed to any heathen composition that can be compared with it, it is a monument of the unfolding of the natural life to the splendor of its full bloom of earthly bliss in a manner pleasing to God, such an unfolding as was possible only where the natural life was under the protection of a guidance which was shaping its way to the ultimate redemption. And if we look at the place which it holds in the sacred history, at the end of five hundred years' direct development of Israel, when in his king and his king's son (Ps. lxxii. 1) the complete form of national sovereignty had been reached, it has its significance in regard to the spiritual counterpart of this glory, that in his whole estate the king has nothing on earth to which his heart is so completely given, as Shulamith, his only love: in this personal, human relation he finds the full satisfaction of his life. When the King of glory, in whom we hope, appears, His people shall also be His bride. His Church is to Him both people and wife, as the relation between man and woman established at the creation is no less a prophecy of Christ and His Church, than the relation of the king of Israel to His people in the history of redemption. The relation, in which the Lord stands to His Church is entirely a personal one, like that between Solomon and Shulamith. Then we shall not expound this or that particular in the Song of songs of him, but the glad antitype of the loving communion which it sings shall have come to pass, identical with the antitype of the relation between the anointed of the Lord and Israel." Comp. Schriftbeweis II. 2, p. 370 f.: "The poet sets before our eyes the depth and the blessedness of this love of the sexes (of which it is said viii. 6 that it is "strong as death") and the glory of corporeal beauty, when love is awakened and nourished by it, both of them as the natural products of creative energy, and therefore abstracted from those moral qualities which impart to corporeal beauty a value dependent on the individual, and lend to the love of the sexes a basis and a substance dependent on the individual. . . . . . Only in the same sense, therefore, in which the creation of woman was the institution of marriage, can Canticles be called an extolling of marriage. The divinely created relation of the sexes as differing and yet belonging together, upon which marriage rests, is praised, and that in the richness of its beauty, by the king in whom the people of God attained its highest earthly glory, as the good which in his view surpassed all the good things in his royal magnificence," etc. From this statement of the fundamental idea of the poem by HOFMANN, DELITZSCH differs principally in doing fuller justice to the noble virtues, which in addition to her physical beauty adorn its heroine, and consequently making not merely marriage in general, marriage as belonging to the realm of nature and of sense, but an ideal marriage, or at least an ideal wedded love and fidelity the object extolled by the poet. He hopes (according to p. 155 ff.) that he has by his exposition led to the recognition of a side of the Song of Solomon hitherto ignored or neglected: "viz., the ethical character of Shulamith, the fine and feeling picture of her soul, fairer even than the fair body which it tenanted, and in general her profound, persistent and calm moral earnestness, the golden ground on which the smiling colors of this joyous song are every where laid." "Shulamith's beauty," he continues, "is not mere physical beauty of the corporeal form, nor the beauty of a Grecian statue of Aphrodite, when one feels as though the finely shaped marble began to live and to walk. Her beauty is not merely natural, but moral and living. This moral life is not indeed the New Testament spiritual life from God, which will finally transform the physical life into its own likeness, but at the same time it has not the mere semblance of virtue, in which what are only splendida vitia so often shine not only in the heathen world, but in the world at large. The morality of Shulamith is no more devoid of substance and value than the Old Testament morality in general. Shulamith is still nature and not spirit, but her nature has been well trained in the fear of Jehovah, hallowed by the grace of Jehovah. What is specifically Israelitish indeed recedes in Shulamith quite into the background behind the universally human. This is the fundamental character of all the written productions of the Chokmah in the time of Solomon. But this splendid and fragrant growth of a hallowed nature and a noble maidenhood does not disown the soil on which it has grown. It is the soil of the revelation deposited in Israel."* As the particular moral traits or virtues in Shulamith's character, he then specifies—1) her sincere, really personal and not merely sensual love for her royal lover; 2) her child-like and naive simplicity; 3) her hearty delight in nature; 4) her chaste and pure womanhood; 5) her sisterly love and filial affection for her mother. The effect which this profoundly moral character of hers has upon Solomon, consists in his "becoming a child himself in the noblest sense of the word through the influence of Shulamith." "The love with which, simple, humble, chaste as she is, she inspires the king, teaches the wise man child-like simplicity, brings the king down into the vale of humility, sets respectful bounds to the impetuous lover. He is compelled to acknowledge that this lily of the field in the artless attire of her beauty and her virtue is more richly adorned than he in all his glory. Nature no longer speaks to the natural philosopher the language of perplexing enigmas, but the gentle language of love. The possessor of a full harem has found the one to whom henceforth his heart belongs, and to no other besides. Following her he willingly exchanges the bustle and splendor of court life for the retirement and simplicity of the country. Afar from his palace, if he but has her on his arm, he roves over mountain and meadow, and with her he is contented in her cottage. Shulamith has become queen without surrendering the virtues of the plain, poor country maid, and Solomon has become Shulamith's husband without losing his royal dignity. Solomon's character in fact appears in twice as fine a light in his self-humiliation, and so does Shulamith in her exaltation." Further considerations respecting the ethical character of the two lovers and the typical significance of their relation to each other, and its place in the history of redemption, will be adduced in the "doctrinal and ethical" remarks upon each section of the Song.

REMARK 2.—HITZIG has attempted to treat the action of the poem as purely ideal, as mere fable or fiction without historical truth. "It is not to be supposed," he says on p. 3 of his Commentary, "that a real history, which either contained this moral of itself, or admitted of its introduction, lies at the basis of this Song. On the contrary, some occurrence living in story may have suggested just this dress. If it concerned merely the king and his lady love, the poet might match Solomon and Shulamith about as well as Tryphon and Tryphæna. The partner introduced for Solomon is הַשּׁוּלַמִּית, "the Shulamite," so like the name of the king, that the resemblance cannot be mistaken. Now a fair damsel from Shunem (Shulem) really was at one time brought to court, when Solomon was young (1 Kings i. 3, 4), on whose account Solomon had his half-brother put to death for proposing to marry her, 1 Kings ii. 13–25. This deed, which might seem to have sprung from jealousy (comp. the thesis viii. 6; Prov. vi. 34 f.) together with the similarity of "Shulamith" and "Solomon," may have first determined the direction in which the idea should incorporate itself."—Against this combination of HITZIG's (substantially adopted by WEISSBACH, p. 66 f.), which is designed to show the mythical character of the piece, may be urged in general all the probable grounds for its composition by Solomon himself, or even for its originating in Solomon's time, which were presented in § 3; and in particular still further: 1) the complete unison—not partial merely—between the historical situation described in the piece and the state of culture in the times of Solomon as depicted in the books of Kings, or, in other words, the absence of any contradiction between the Solomon of history and the Solomon of this book, together with the numerous striking and wholly undesigned coincidences in the situation and character of both. 2) The improbability of an intentional parallel between the names "Solomon" and "Shulamith," which have no surprising similarity of sound, and are not contrasted any where in the piece, though opportunities for doing so were not rare (ii. 16; iv. 1 ff.; vi. 3; vii. 11; viii. 11 ff). 3) It is extremely forced and far-fetched to identify the heroine of the Song with Abishag of Shunem, David's concubine, and especially to explain viii. 6 of a supposed jealousy about this Shulamitess, which might have moved Solomon to put his brother Adonijah to death. 4) It is a very probable and obvious assumption that Shunem, on account of the remarkable beauty of its daughters, may have been the home of one of the concubines of the king of Israel in more instances than just this one, 1 Kings i. 3, 4, and that this furnishes the explanation of the gentile denomination of the heroine of this piece as "the Shunamitess" (Shulamitess). 5) The analogy of the book of Job, which likewise has a historical fact as its basis underneath its dramatic form (comp. HIRZEL, Job, p. 7 ff.), in spite of the fact that its peculiarly speculative character seems in a much higher degree to favor the assumption that its contents are purely fictitious.*

* [The implication that the life of the people of God under the Old Testament was not only upon a lower level, but was specifically different from that under the New Testament, belongs to the philosophical speculations which DELITZSCH is fond of indulging. He conceives that the fact of the incarnation introduced an entirely new element into human nature which did not exist, and could not have existed prior to that event.—TR.]

[NOTE ON THE INTERPRETATION OF THE SONG OF SOLOMON—By the Translator.—The substitution of the typical method, for which ZÖCKLER contends, in place of the allegorical, which has hitherto chiefly prevailed among evangelical interpreters of this book, marks a decided and most wholesome advance in its exposition. It is bringing into the study of the Canticles that method which has been applied with such salutary effect to the investigation of the Old Testament in general, and of its types in particular, by the most recent and able biblical scholars, and which is represented, for example, in the well-known writings of KURTZ and FAIRBAIRN.

1. The allegorical method, which it is proposed to discard, regards the persons and objects described in this song, as in themselves unreal, as mere figures or names for spiritual persons and objects, which latter were the actual and only things contemplated and intended by the inspired penman. In what he here writes of Solomon and Shulamith he had before his mind not two real or even imaginary persons possessing definite characteristics, and sustaining a known relation to each other, which were symbols of spiritual characteristics and of a spiritual relation, the contemplation of the former being a medium through which he and others might rise to a fuller and more correct comprehension of the latter. But in all the language which he employs he is directly and consciously describing Christ and His Church. He imputes certain physical attributes or outward acts to Solomon, but it is not because they in fact belonged to him personally, or were appropriate to him as a man, a monarch, or a husband, but because there are certain attributes or works of Christ, of which these are or may be constituted emblems. And so in every expression used respecting the bride he is not depicting a human person real or ideal, but is simply employing a figure of speech which is to be applied directly to the Church, and which finds its justification in its fitness to set forth some feature or characteristic of the Church.

Hence, it happens that the great body of the allegorical interpreters, even the ablest and the best, refrain from inquiring into the meaning of the language used in its literal application, as though this were no part of its true and proper intent, but apply it immediately to Christ and His Church as the parties directly described, and the only ones, in fact, who come fairly within its scope. So far from possessing themselves first of the literal sense of the Song in its primary application to the sphere of natural life, and making this the basis from which to rise to a spiritual significance which should carry the same principles into a higher sphere, viewing in the outward and the human a reflection of the inward and divine, they positively assert that no consistent literal sense is discoverable. And they triumph in the assertion as an unanswerable argument, precluding the possibility of any other than a spiritual interpretation, whereas they are destroying the foundation underneath themselves, and making it impossible upon their principles to build up any exposition of the book which shall not rest upon the sand. It is certainly a most extraordinary procedure by which to substantiate the claim that the spiritual and the divine are in this Song set forth under the image of the earthly, to annihilate the latter with a view to exalting the former. If there is no substance nor consistency in the earthly image, what becomes of the heavenly counterpart? They who proclaim that they can make no consistent sense of the Song in its literal acceptation, should remember that the natural presumption will be not that no such sense exists, but that they have failed to find the key to its understanding. And if they cannot interpret the earthly meaning which lies upon the surface, what assurance can they give that they are safe guides to its heavenly and hidden mysteries? What is this but to play into the hands of those who claim that they can give a consistent sense to it literally underderstood, and that no higher meaning is necessary or possible?

We greatly deprecate such language as the following from so devout and evangelical a commentator as WORDSWORTH: "Upon the principles of the literal interpretation, how can it be explained that in the Canticles, the bridegroom is called by such various names? How are we to account for the fact that the same person, who is called the beloved, is also designated as a king, as King Solomon, as a shepherd, as feeding among lilies, as an owner of a garden and of a vineyard, which he has let out to keepers, and of which he will require the fruit?" This is, in our judgment, simply a concession to those who insist that there is more than one lover here spoken of, or who make of the Song itself a jumble of incoherent fragments. Again, we must utter our most vehement protest against such statements as these from the same able writer: "If the objects to which the bride is compared in the Canticles are understood in their literal sense, such a picture will be produced as would deserve to be censured and condemned in the strong language of the Roman critic denouncing a tasteless and ill-assorted rhapsody of incongruous enormities." "How, again, are we to interpret the description of the bridegroom's features? Expounded literally, some of the details in the portrait are absurd and ridiculous, others are even repulsive and revolting." It becomes a question whether it is not more reverential to divine inspiration to abandon the spiritual sense altogether, if it can only be maintained by thus vilifying this sacred Song.

2. Besides this neglect and undue depreciation of the literal sense, we object to the allegorical method, in the second place, that it inverts the true relation between the outward form and the spiritual substance in this Song. By an original divine constitution there are thoughts and ideas embodied in the sphere of natural life, which reach into the spiritual sphere, and these are made use of as helps for climbing from the lower to the higher. We must not lose sight of the divine economy in this matter. There was not, first, the communication of a complete system of doctrine in its fulness and in abstract form, which the sacred writer, being in entire possession of, seeks to impart to others—and in so doing, looks about for some analogy which he strives to adapt to it, even at the risk of utterly distorting the inferior object which he so employs. But the type comes before the doctrine, and is preparatory to it. God places before the eyes of His inspired servants, and through them before all others, these outward types, with their correspondences to the heavenly and divine. These natural objects and relations furnish the lessons which under divine guidance they are to study, by which they are to be educated to the comprehension of the spiritual, which is wrapped up in them, and which they are adapted to convey.

3. The allegorical method further violates the analogy of Old Testament instruction. This was once the favorite mode of dealing with types, but it led to such fanciful, grotesque and far-fetched explanations as to bring the whole subject of typology into disrepute. and it has now been discarded by sober inquirers. The true principles are thus stated by Prof. FAIRBAIRN, Typology, I., pp. 81 ff.: "In the interpretation of types our first care must be to make ourselves acquainted with the truths or ideas involved in them merely as providential transactions or religious services—to make what they were in their immediate relation to the patriarchal or religious worshipper, the ground and matter of what, as typical, they are now to the Christian." "Their typical import is not something apart from their natural and immediate design, but consisting of that and growing out of it." "The essential character and objects of the transaction, in which the type consists, become thus the ground and matter of its typical relation to the realities of the gospel. But if we should proceed in an opposite direction and make the essential qualities of the antitype the measure of what we are to expect in the type, then, as a matter of course, we shall be driven to seek in the latter many trifling and fanciful resemblances, which have no idea or principle in them whatever." The Messianic teaching of the Psalms, which belong to the same stage of divine revelation with the Song of Solomon, is entirely of the typical character. It is wholly drawn from the personal experience or the official position of David or of Solomon, more or less idealized, with or without a removal of human limitations. It is not until we reach the period of the prophets that the typical element recedes into the background, and is partially, though not entirely, superseded by a more didactic style of instruction. No one can fail to recognize the distinction in this respect between Canticles and Ezekiel, ch. xvi., xxiii.

4. It also disregards the needs of the people of God under the Old Testament. It must be assumed that Canticles, like every other book of Scripture, had its special adaptation to the wants of those for whom it was immediately prepared. It was part of the divine system of instruction under which they were placed, and had its determinate function to fulfil in preparation for Him that was to come. Now if it contained the mysteries which allegorical interpreters find hidden under its language, it must have been to its earliest readers a sealed book. They did not have before them the detailed history and doctrine of Christ and His Church, from which conjecturally to fit expressions in the Song by a mere casual and superficial similitude. Nor could they be expected to have any inkling whatever of the meaning of passages, whose sense is elicited by punning upon words, as though the "chains," i. 10, represent the "law," because תוֹרִים bears some resemblance in sound to תוֹרָה, and the "cyprus flower," i. 14, alludes to the atonement because of an ambiguity in the word כֹּפֶר. If this is the way that Canticles is to be expounded, it is a mere book of riddles, whose solution is sufficiently puzzling and doubtful with all the facts and teachings of the gospels before us, but which could not possibly be comprehended while the objects referred to were still veiled by the future. If, however, the language of Canticles describes not future or unknown objects in enigmatical terms, but scenes real or ideal belonging to the sphere of earthly love, which is a symbol of the heavenly, then the analogies of thought must lead directly from one to the other. And Solomon's contemporaries, as well as later generations, could rise at least to a partial comprehension of its meaning; not, it is true, to an exhaustive understanding of it, for the deep meaning of Scripture grows with growing light and fuller knowledge and further revelation. But the more advanced interpretation must lie in the line just indicated, only penetrating further, not in the way of loading the text with far-fetched and fanciful senses. Scripture does not have a multiple sense, if by this be meant that it is to bear every signification which can by possibility be put upon its disconnected words; but the ideas manifestly underlying it may be followed out into further developments and wider applications.

5. Our last objection to the allegorical method is that it cannot achieve a well grounded and satisfactory interpretation of this book. It loses itself perpetually in details, where it spends its strength in random guess-work. The ingenuity with which this may be done, and the devout spirit with which it may be pervaded, cannot alter the essentially vicious character of the process. As ADAM CLARKE justly says, he could make anything whatever out of this Song that he was disposed to make, if he were allowed equal liberty: he could find Arminianism in it or any type of doctrine he chose. The pious use made of the language of the book cannot redeem it from the charge of mal-interpretation. It is not exposition but substituting human fancies for the true meaning and intent of the divine Word. The pious senses inserted, the edifying reflections and the devout meditations do not sanctify a mode of dealing with the book of God so utterly unwarrantable.

This mode of expounding each separate particular, not with a view to its place in the description in which it stands, but as a distinct reference to the spiritual object typified by it, necessarily leads both to a serious distortion of the lessons to be conveyed, and to a marring and mangling of the symmetry and beauty of the objects depicted. Thus Dr. ADDISON ALEXANDER in his Commentary on Isaiah v. 3, "The parable, as a whole, corresponds to its subject as a whole, but all the particulars included in the one, are not separately intended to denote particulars included in the other. A lion may be a striking emblem of a hero; but it does not follow that the mane, claws, etc., of the beast must all be significant of something in the man. Nay, they cannot even be supposed to be so, without sensibly detracting from the force and beauty of the image as a whole." See also similar language used on Isaiah lx. 7, and in his Commentary on Mark iv. 13, and xii. 6. Is it surprising that WORDSWORTH could see no beauty in the figures of this book literally understood after mercilessly carving them to shapeless fragments by his dissecting knife?

For these reasons we believe the typical to be the true method of interpreting this Song, and we shall conceive it to be a most important service rendered by this commentary if it shall in any measure contribute to check the unbridled extravagance of the prevalent devotion to allegory and encourage a simpler and juster style of interpretation. According to the typical understanding of Canticles, which has already been characterized in the general, but may here be more exactly described, its primary subject and that which is denoted by its language in its literal acceptation is the loving intercourse of king Solomon and his bride. But in consequence of Solomon's representative character as the vicegerent and type of the divine king of Israel, his individual and earthly relations become the mirror of the spiritual and the heavenly. His human love to the woman of his choice is the symbol of the love of God to His elect people, of Jehovah to Israel, of Christ to His church. This latter is not directly and enigmatically described by the terms of the Song, but is shadowed forth by the scenes and the feelings which are depicted in it. The Solomon of the Song is not the heavenly, but the earthly Solomon: he is presented, however, not in his individual personality merely, but in the capacity of a king and a lover or a husband, thus suggesting the ideal king and the ideal lover, and to this extent, and in this manner, shadowing forth the greatest and most glorious of monarchs, the most tender and affectionate, the most loving and the best of bridegrooms, Jehovah-Jesus.

The very first step toward the correct understanding of this book as of any type, or parable, or similitude whatsoever is the inquiry after its literal sense,—what is the object itself that is here presented? It is impossible to develop the spiritual meaning of a symbol until it is first ascertained what the symbol is. The literal sense is the foundation of the whole. If this be not correctly gathered and distinctly apprehended, every ulterior result is vitiated. The most cursory inspection shows this book to relate to the loving intercourse of a bridegroom and his bride. But what is the precise nature and the mutual relations of the several scenes depicted? Do the various parts cohere in one connected narrative, which traces through successive steps the growing intimacy of the loving pair? if so, what is the story, or the plot which forms the ground work of the book? Or does it contain a series of detached scenes, each complete in itself? if so, what are the limits of each, and what the precise situation and action depicted in it? Is the whole prior to marriage, or subsequent to marriage, or does the marriage occur in the course of the Song, and if so, where? A true conception must first be gained of the book in the exhibition which it makes of the human love described in it, before we can be prepared to understand the particular aspect, method, or measures of divine love which it is adapted to set forth.

The service performed by the erotic commentators on this Song in the history of interpretation, is that of directing attention to this most astonishing oversight on the part of the allegorists, one extreme as usual generating its opposite, and thus preparing the way for its own correction. The egregious perversions of the literal sense by those who have bestowed upon it their exclusive attention can only be fairly refuted and their utter baselessness shown, when the correct scheme of this book shall be fully drawn out and fortified in every part.

In our opinion ZÖCKLER has not been as successful in his results as he is correct in his method. Neither he nor DELITZSCH, whom he follows with some modifications, has solved the problem of the book so far as to make a faithful exhibit of its literal sense. They are both captivated with the idea, which we are persuaded is fallacious, of finding a regularly unfolded plot, and in their eagerness to make out continuity and progress they have obtruded upon this sacred poem what finds no warrant in its text, and marred the artless simplicity of its structure by needless complications. A complete and satisfactory presentation of the literal sense of Canticles is a very great desideratum; and this is the direction in which we are disposed to look with the greatest hope for further progress in unfolding its more profound mysteries.

Upon the literal is built the ethical sense. DELITZSCH here loses himself too much in a mere romantic sentimentalism. The erotic interpreters, as GINSBURG, discover an example of virtue superior to the greatest temptations: they make it a story of faithful love shown in a maiden, whom the king by all his arts and by the most dazzling allurements cannot seduce from her shepherd lover to whom she had given her heart. ZÖCKLER here attempts a compromise which is an attitude he frequently occupies in the course of his commentary. He drops the shepherd lover, but still represents Solomon in an unfavorable though less repulsive light, and makes all the pure and elevating influence proceed from Shulamith, who is the true heroine of the Song, and by whom her royal husband is completely over-shadowed. The discontent with Solomon's court and with the style of life prevailing there, which DELITZSCH affirms, is pushed by ZÖCKLER to what is perhaps its legitimate result, dissatisfaction with Solomon himself who was tainted by the corrupting influences around him. She however wins the proud lord of a harem completely to herself and makes him all her own; from love to her he forsakes his voluptuous court for the retirement and gentle pleasures of her country home. He thus finds in it the triumph of chastity over sensuality, of a pure monogamy over the voluptuousness of polygamy.

We cannot deny that there is a certain attractiveness at the first view in the thought of a rebuke to polygamy in the person of one, by whom it was carried to such unheard of excess, if it were not that the whole thing is imported into the Song by the mere fancy of the interpreter. Whatever unfavorable surmises might attach to Solomon's life as recorded in Kings, there is nothing whatever in this book to justify them. He says and does nothing to warrant the suspicion of a want of constancy in his love for Shulamith or a fickle preference for others. Shulamith never betrays any apprehension that she has not her full share of his love, or that his conduct belies his professions of fond attachment. The temporary separation—it can scarcely be called estrangement—which gives her so much pain, is traced by herself to her own drowsy inaction, v. 3. The only allusion to the existing number of queens, vi. 8, is for the sake of ranking her above them all as the idol of her husband's heart. The daughters of Jerusalem never appear as rivals, toward whom Shulamith expresses or cherishes any jealousy. But apart from the unfounded presumptions on which the whole is based, it involves a preposterous conflict between Solomon's regal dignity and his married state, that in order to possess Shulamith as his own, and be completely hers, he should have to abandon his capital and his court and the occupations of royalty, and go to live with her in her mother's house at Shunem. And further, it is a most extraordinary mode of inculcating monogamy for Shulamith to marry a king already the possessor of sixty queens, and then to set about securing him entirely to herself, and leading him to abandon all the rest. Would not this be more like the artful intriguing favorite than the guileless, simple-hearted child of nature, which she is represented as being?

All that can in fairness be made out of the ethical view of this book, as it appears to us, is that two parties are here described who live in and for each other. Proofs and instances are given of their devotion and fondness, their ardent longing for each other when separated, their delight in each other when united, their increased enjoyment in every source of pleasure, of which they partake together. The constancy, the tenderness, the purity, the fervor of wedded love, finds repeated and varied exemplification. Canticles does not rise to the inculcation of monogamy nor assert for marriage that according to its primeval institution and its true idea it must be between one man and one woman. It alludes to polygamy, vi. 8, without disallowing or positively prohibiting it as an offence against the ordinance of God and the welfare of man. It belongs to a dispensation under which for the hardness of men's hearts this institution had been suffered to be clouded, and its original brightness dimmed. It issues no interdict against polygamy, but it undermines it. First, by drying up its source. It exhibits a style of intercourse between the sexes which is pure, elevated and refined, sensitive to the charms of beauty and of personal attractions, but without a trace of sensuality. There is no grossness, no impurity, no indelicacy even. Everything of that nature which has been attached to this gem of songs, should be laid to the account of mistranslation or misinterpretation. Secondly, by raising up an adversary too powerful for it. This Song depicts a mutual love which is absolutely exclusive, ii. 2, 16; iv. 12; vi. 3, 9; vii. 10; viii. 6, 7; and before which polygamy must fall, not because it is forbidden, but because it cannot be endured.

Greatly as we approve of ZÖCKLER's typical method of dealing with Canticles, we cannot accept what is peculiar in the typical views which he deduces from it. This follows, of course, from the exceptions we have taken to his literal conception of it, upon which it is based. Some may probably be shocked by the fact that he represents Shulamith as Solomon's superior in point of virtue and purity, and the instrument of working at least a temporary change for the better in him, while at the same time he says that Solomon and Shulamith are types of the Lord and His church. This, however, is not of itself sufficient to condemn his view. All types have their deficiencies. Some are deplorably defective, without after all ceasing to be types. There is a real foundation for what ZÖCKLER calls types of analogy and types of contrast, or as we have ourselves been in the habit of designating them, direct and inverse types, the former being objects which directly shadow forth the future good, and the latter such as stand in opposition to it or represent a want which it can supply. And in every individual type there are at the same time elements of correspondence with the ultimate ideal and of divergence from it, both of which must be taken into the account if its full lessons are to be unfolded.

If the question respected the typical character of Solomon on the whole, as a personage in the sacred History, it could not be objected that a more unfavorable view is taken of him than the facts recorded warrant. And it may be added that in the book of Ecclesiastes, which is inversely or negatively Messianic, the kingdom of Solomon is shown upon its unsatisfying side, in which it presents a marked contrast with that of his great antitype. We are now, however, solely concerned with Solomon as he is represented in the Song of songs. The typical, as the other lessons of the Song must be drawn from itself, without any such supplement at least from other sources as would distort the image presented here. A picture is presented to us belonging to the sphere of natural life; this must be simply transferred to the spiritual sphere to yield its typical or higher meaning. Features of Solomon's character which would have marred the significance or effect of the whole, may be neglected or lost sight of. They do not belong to the conception of this Song, which must be interpreted by itself.

Did the writer of this book intend anything more than the literal and ethical sense? ZÖCKLER thinks not. He supposes him to have composed this poem, setting forth this incident in the life of Solomon. He had no more in his mind than the human parties, the play of their affections, and the fond relation constituted between them. But the nature of the transaction itself, and the position of the principal actor in the sacred history impart to it a typical import, of which Solomon himself, in writing it, had no conception. Its connection with Solomon, and its ethical bearings in his view justify its place among the sacred oracles, even apart from its mystical meaning. This is a question of some difficulty. For, 1. It cannot be affirmed that the book itself contains any clear indication of its higher meaning; what has been adduced as showing that the writer intended something more profound than lies upon the surface, is mostly of doubtful interpretation, and is scarcely sufficient to produce conviction. 2. Such instances as Ruth, Esther, and many of the Proverbs may make us cautious in undertaking to determine in advance what amount of evident religious character is necessary to entitle a book to admission to the canon of the Old Testament. 3. The sacred historians in all probability were ignorant of the typical nature of much that they have recorded.

Nevertheless, we cannot but believe that the writer of this divine Song recognized the symbolical character of that love, which he has here embellished. The typical character of the king of Israel was familiarly known, as is apparent from many of the Psalms. The typical character of Solomon's own reign was well understood by himself, as appears from Psalm lxxii. That the Lord's relation to His people was conceived of as a marriage from the time of the covenant at Sinai, is shown by repeated expressions that imply it, in the law of Moses. That under these circumstances, the marriage of the King of Israel should carry the thoughts up by a ready and spontaneous association to the covenant-relation of the King par excellence to the people, whom He had espoused to Himself, is surely no extravagant supposition, even if the analogous instance of Psalm xlv. did not remove it from the region of conjecture to that of established fact. The mystical use made of marriage so frequently in the subsequent scriptures, with evident and even verbal allusion to this Song, and the constant interpretation of both the Synagogue and the Church, show the naturalness of the symbol, and enhance the probability that the writer himself saw what the great body of his readers have found in his production. And whatever may be said apologetically of the sacredness of this book, if its inspired author intended it in its literal sense alone, it exalts it so prodigiously, and frees it so completely from every shadow of objection, to suppose him to have employed this symbol with some consciousness of its sacred meaning, that I cannot bring myself to believe that the wise King of Israel was so blind as some have imagined him to be. And I am not sure but the absence of the name of God, and of any distinctive religious expressions throughout the Song is thus to be accounted for that the writer, conscious of the parabolic character of what he is describing, felt that there would be an incongruity in mingling the symbol with the thing symbolized. See ISAAC TAYLOR's Spirit of the Hebrew Poetry, pp. 174, 5].

§ 5. HISTORY AND LITERATURE (BIBLIOGRAPHY) OF THE INTERPRETATION OF THE SONG OF SOLOMON.

a. *The allegorical attempts at explanation in ancient and modern times.

It is as impossible to deny that the mystical and allegorical view of the Song of Solomon, which entirely disregards the literal sense, and sees nothing in it but an exhibition in a figurative dress, of the covenant-relation between Jehovah and Israel, or of the loving communion of Messiah with His Church, may have had advocates among the Jewish scribes before the close of the Old Testament canon, as it is to prove that this view was the only one in the period before Christ, or that it was the conditio sine qua non of the reception of the book into the canon. For neither the acquaintance which the author of Prov. i–ix, xxii.–xxiv betrays with it (see § 3, REM. 1), nor the frequent use made of it by the prophet Hosea at a somewhat later period (comp. Hos. xiv. 6-9 with Cant. ii. 1, v. 15, iv. 11, vi. 11, etc.), affords any certain proof that the allegorical explanation was already cultivated before the exile at the expense of the historical. That according to the tradition of the Talmud (see R. AZARIAS in Meor Enaim, p. 175 b), EZRA only admitted such books to the canon as "were composed by the prophets in the Holy Spirit," can no more be esteemed a historical testimony for the exclusive prevalence of the allegorical interpretation at the time of the collection of the canon, than the statement of the TARGUM on i. 1, that the Song of Songs was sung "by Solomon the prophet and king of Israel in the spirit of prophecy." Nor can any proof be brought from the Old Testament Apocrypha of the existence of the allegorical mode of interpretation before the time of Christ. The passages adduced for this purpose by ROSENMUELLER, Wisd. viii. 2, 9, 16, 18; Eccles. xxiv. 18, 19, by no means necessarily imply that the bride of the Canticles was taken to be the divine wisdom; and against the validity of the passage Eccles. xlvii. 15-17 urged by KEIL, even HENGSTENBERG has shown that Solomon's παροιμίαι, παραβολαί and ἑρμηνεῖαι, "proverbs, parables and interpretations" here extolled, simply refer to the proverbs and enigmatical sayings of the king mentioned, 1 Kin. v. 12 (iv. 32) ff., x. 1 ff., not to any mystical sense of this "Song of songs." Nor can the SEPTUAG. be adduced as representing the allegorical interpretation of this Song; for though it renders מֵרֹאשׁ אֲמָנָה iv. 8 by ἀπὸ ἀρχῆς πίστεως and כְּתִרְצָה by ὡς εὐδοκία, these are errors of translation, which only show that the two localities in question (Amana and Tirzah) were no longer known to the authors of the Alexandrian version. No certain traces of a use of the Song of Solomon in an allegorical sense can be pointed out even in the writings of PHILO; and the same is true of the New Testament, where, at the utmost Rev. iii. 20 might be regarded as an expression taken from the Song of Solomon, explained of the Messiah, but is more probably to be traced, like what is elsewhere said of Christ as the bridegroom of His Church (e. g. Mat. ix. 15, John iii. 29, etc.), to the corresponding ideas and expressions in the figurative language of the prophets in general.* Comp. § 4, p. 16, and in opposition to the different judgment expressed by HENGSTENBERG respecting these passages of the New Testament, comp. especially UMBREIT in Herzog's Real Encyc., vol. vi. p. 207 f.

Accordingly, it is not until the period after Christ and His apostles that really unmistakable traces are found of the allegorical understanding and treatment of the Song of Solomon; and in the first instance in the way that the author of the fourth book of Esdras, an apocalyptic production of a Jewish Christian, written probably in the time of Domitian, uses the expressions "lily" and "dove," v. 24, 26, with unmistakable reference to Cant. ii. 1, vi. 9, as mystical designations of the Church of God. Then in an allegorical explanation of iii. 11, given by R. SIMON BEN GAMALIEL about the year 120 of the Christian era (see Taanith, IV. 8): and finally in the solemn asseveration of R. AKIBA, the celebrated contemporary of this R. SIMON (in Yadaim III. 5), that Canticles defiles the hands, and is to be regarded not only as a holy, but in comparison with the rest of the Hagiographa as a most holy book † (קדש קדשים). The Synagogue, from the first centuries of the Christian era, must have universally proceeded on the assumption attested by this declaration of a hidden allegorical sense to this book. For ORIGEN and JEROME testify that it was a universal custom among the Jews in their time, not to allow any one to study the Canticles, the account of the creation in Genesis (the מעשה בראשית) or the 1st chap. of the Prophet Ezekiel (the מעשה מרכבה) before the thirtieth year of his life. And IBN EZRA declares that it was an undoubted and undisputed fact that nothing in the Canticles was spoken literally, but all figuratively.‡

Great numbers of both Jewish and Christian interpreters have since treated the Song of Solomon in this one-sided allegorical method, which fritters away the historical sense altogether, and sets it aside as offensive. Of the former, the most ancient whose work has come down to us is the author of the TARGUM, which is at all events post-Talmudic. The model thus given was followed by most of the Rabbins of the middle ages, particularly RASHI, KIMCHI, and IBN EZRA, of Toledo, in the twelfth century, who has already been mentioned, and who sees in the book an allegorical and prophetical representation of the history of Israel from the time of Abraham (whilst the other rabbinical interpreters almost universally, like the TARGUMIST, make the action begin with the exodus from Egypt under Moses); likewise MOSES MAIMONIDES (†1204), who in his More Nebochim, explains some passages at least of the poem, and this in such a way that "its historical contents vanish entirely, and the mystical signification of its poetical and figurative expressions is alone of any worth." In the Church ORIGEN brought the mystical and allegorical mode of treatment into vogue, and by far the greatest number of the fathers and the theologians of the middle ages, and even of more recent times, have followed him, with however the subordinate variations that to the mystico-spiritual view represented by him, by JEROME, MACARIUS, THEODORET, BERNARD of Clairvaux, etc., there have also been added in the course of time a mystico-doctrinal (CYPRIAN, ATHANASIUS, JOACHIM LANGE, RAMBACH, STARKE, etc.), a mystico-political or historical (AUGUSTIN, LUTHER), a mystico-prophetical (COCCEIUS, GULICH, HEUNISCH, REINHARDT, etc.), a mystico-Mariological (AMBROSE, RUPERT V. DEUTZ, DIONYSIUS CARTHUSIANUS, MICH. GHISLERIUS, SALMERON, CORNELIUS A

* [THRUPP remarks on the contrary: "It is indeed there never directly quoted; but, on the other hand, the passages in which its language and its imagery are in various ways embodied, are numerous; the use thus made of it is uniformly allegorical; the cumulative cogency of these repeated dependences upon it in favor of the allegorical interpretation becomes very great; and throughout the New Testament no hint is to be found that it bore or could bear any other than an allegorical meaning." The passages, which he cites in proof of this conclusion in his commentary pp. 53–55, are not all equally convincing; some are wholly fanciful. But enough remain to satisfy an unprejudiced mind that the inspired writers of the New Testament and our Lord Himself found a deeper meaning in this Song than appears upon its surface.—TR.]

† See the passage in J. D. MICHAELIS' Preface: "Absit omni modo ut qui Israelita negaret, quod canticum canticorum non polluat manus sive non sit sacrum; quia totus mundus tanti non est ac ille dies quo canticum canticorum Israeli est datum. Omnia enim Hagiographa sacra sunt, sed canticum canticorum est sacratissimum. Etsi qua de Salomonis scriptis dissensio fuit (viz., whether they belong in the canon—comp. Aboth de RABBI NATHAN, c. 1 in DELITZSCH, Hohel., p. 48), ea tantum de Ecclesiaste fuit."

‡ Præf., in Cant. Cantic.: "Absit, absit, ut canticum canticorum de voluptate carnali agat; omnia potius figurate in eo dicuntur. Nisi enim maxima ejus dignitas, inter libros Scripturæ sacræ relatum non esset; neque ulla de eo est controversia."

LAPIDE, etc.), and even a mystico-hieroglyphical (PUFENDORF and RUNGE, 1776). They are all agreed, however, that the whole poem was conceived by the author with a conscious allegorical design. The most recent allegorical expositors also occupy substantially the same ground, now inclining to one and now to another of these modifications; as ROSENMUELLER, HUG and KAISER have sought each in his own way to reproduce the mystico-historical or political method of explanation of former times; GOLTZ, the mystico-prophetical; H. A. HAHN, KEIL, O. v. GERLACH, HENGSTENBERG, the mystico-doctrinal; GUST. JAHN and others, the mystico-spiritual mode of explanation.

I. JEWISH ALLEGORICAL EXPOSITIONS.

TARGUM in Cant. Canticorum (contained in the TARGUM to the five Megilloth, viz., Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Esther, Ecclesiastes), best printed in the Paris and London polyglots. It betrays, by its references to the TALMUD, and even to the Mohammedans, that it was not composed until the eighth century probably, which, however, does not exclude a higher antiquity for many of its remarks and stories strung together in the style of the Haggada. It forms a continuous "picture of Israel's history from the exodus out of Egypt through the oppressions of the kingdoms of the world until his final redemption." "Draw me after thee" (i. 4), is explained of the march of the people under the conduct of Jehovah to Sinai; "Look not at me, because I am black" (i. 6) of the penitent confession of sin by those who had forsaken Jehovah for the golden calf; "Tell me, thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest," etc. (i. 7), of Moses' supplication for the transgressing people; the festive procession described in iii. 6–11 of the taking of the promised land by Joshua, and the building of Solomon's temple; the words (vii. 13) "let us go to the vineyards," etc., of Israel praying for deliverance from the Babylonish exile; the "odorous mandrakes" (vii. 14) of the period of deliverance already come; and finally, the concluding verse (viii. 14) is explained as a petition to the Lord, that He would speedily bring back the scattered people to the "spice mountains," i. e., to the temple mountain in Jerusalem, with its fragrant offerings of incense—all this is interwoven with gross anachronisms, strange leaps of thought, and extravagant fancies of every description; comp. ZUNZ, Gottesdienstliche Vorträge der Juden, etc., p. 65 f.; DELITZSCH, Hohel., p. 49; UMBREIT, loc. cit., p. 208 f. RASHI (i. e, R. SOLOMON BEN ISAAC, † 1105), Commentarius in libros historicos et Salomonis V. T., in Lat. vertit J. FR. BREITHAUPT, 1714 (on the rabbinical editions of this Commentator, who is particularly valuable on account of his copious communications from older Jewish allegorical interpreters, comp. DE ROSSI, Histor. Wörterbuch der Judischen Schriftsteller, from the Italian, by HAMBERGER, 1839; also J. CHR. WOLF, Bibliotheca Hebræa, 1715–33, 4 vols.)

DAVID KIMCHI (son of JOSEPH KIMCHI, born at Narbonne, 1190, died after 1250), Commentarius in Cantic. Canticor. (in the rabbinical Bibles of Bomberg and Buxtorf; inclining to the literal interpretation of Scripture, yet setting the greatest store also by the older allegorizing tradition, especially in the exegesis of Messianic passages; comp. M. HEIDENHEIM in HERZOG's Real-Encyklop. XIX. 693).

IBN EZRA (†1167) Commentar. in Cant. Cant., also in Bomberg's and Buxtorf's Bibles; differs from the TARGUM and most of the other rabbins in finding the history of Israel from the time of Abraham allegorically and prophetically represented in the Song of Solomon, and hence it is not until chap. ii. that he comes down to the times of Moses and the giving of the law; he sees, for example, in the voice of the bridegroom, "who comes leaping over mountains and hills," ii. 8, the thunder of Jehovah, by which Sinai was shaken (comp. Ps. xxix.), refers the "peeping of the bridegroom through the window" (ii. 9), to God's looking down upon His people oppressed in Egypt for their help, etc., etc.

MOSES MAIMONIDES († 1204) Moreh Nebochim seu Doctor perplexorum, ed. Jo. BUXTORF, 1629, comp. the Arabic and French edition "le Guide des Egarés," by S. MUNK, Par. 1856–61, 2 vols., explains in the first part of this work in addition to many other passages of the Old Test., which represent the divine under sensible images, various sentences from the Song of Solomon, and in so doing returns to the extremely arbitrary and desultory method of the older Midrash which "at every verse or clause of a verse pours out a perfect cornucopia of the most heterogeneous thoughts and fancies," without aiming at any continuous historico-allegorical explanation of the whole. A characteristic specimen is afforded by the remark upon the opening words i. 2, where the "kiss of his mouth" is taken to be a mystical designation of the union of the Creator with the creature (apprehensio Creatoris cum summo amore Dei conjuncta s Neshikah), and the well-known phrase of the rabbins that Moses, Aaron and Miriam died "in the kiss of God" is traced back to this as its origin. Comp. BUXTORF's Edit. p. 523, and generally JOST, Art. "Maimonides" in HERZOG's Encycl. VIII. 691 ff.

MOSES BEN TIBBON, IMMANUEL BEN SALOMO the Roman, and other rabbinical adherents of the cabalistic and philosophical exegesis of the Jews of the middle ages differ from the common historico-allegorical interpretation in that Solomon is to them a symbol of the highest spiritual will (the intellectus agens), Shulamith a symbol of the lower, merely sensuous and receptive understanding (the intellectus materialis), and the whole is a representation of the union of both effecting the purification of the latter. On the contrary the religious poetry of the Jews of Spain in the Pijut, in so far as it is based on the Song of Solomon, rests on that more widely diffused allegorical view, which sees in Shulamith the "congregation of Israel" (כנסת ישראל). II. CHRISTIAN ALLEGORISTS.

a. The mystico-spiritual interpretation. (Regarding the whole as a figurative representation of the intercourse of Christ with the believing soul).

ORIGEN in Cant. Canticorum Homiliæ duo translated into Lat. by JEROME (see his Opp. ed. VALLARS. Vol. III., p. 500 ff.) is the founder of that method of interpretation which sees in the bride of the Canticles the soul pining for union with God, and in the bridegroom the divine love which sanctifies, purifies and elevates it to itself; he accordingly explains the whole in a moral-soteriological or mystico-psychological manner. Comp. what JEROME says in his translation: "Canticum canticorum amorem cœlestium divinorumque desiderium incutit animæ sub specie sponsæ et sponsi, caritatis et amoris viis perveniendum docens ad consortium Dei."—In his more extended commentary in XII. τόμοι, of which only four books are still extant in the Latin translation of RUFIN (see Origenis Opp. ed. LOMMATZSCH, Vol. 14, 15) he had explained the bride of the Canticles by turns of the individual souls of Christians striving after union with Christ, and of the Church as the collective body of believers, thus combining the mystico-doctrinal with the mystico-spiritual interpretation; and yet through JEROME, who translated the former work only into Latin, and not the latter also, the mystico-spiritual interpretation was rendered almost exclusively influential as a model for later interpreters, particularly in the West.

WILLIRAM (Abbot at Ebersberg in Bavaria † 1085) Paraphrasis in Cant. Canticorum, ed. MERULA, Lugd. Bat. 1598, and H. HOFFMANN, Bresl. 1827, gave a twofold paraphrase of the Song of Solomon, in which he followed the customary allegorical method, one in Lat. hexameters, the other in old high German prose, in both regarding the whole as a colloquy between Christ and the believing soul. The old high German treatise like NOTKER's somewhat older paraphrase of the Psalms is of great interest in the history of language. Comp. BERNARD of Clairvaux, Sermones 86 Super Cant. Canticorum, Opp. Vol. II. ed. Venet. (a diffuse mystico-practical exposition, which, however, only treats the first two chapters and the opening words of the third, and explains the whole of the soul seeking her heavenly bridegroom and introduced by Him first into the garden, then into the banquet hall, and finally into the sleeping chamber, sometimes, moreover, weaving in a doctrinal interpretation as on i. 2, where kissing with the kiss of His mouth is explained of the incarnation of Christ, this "condescending miracle of a kiss, in which not mouth is pressed to mouth but God is united with man," *etc. The continuation of this gigantic work attempted by BERNARD's pupil, GILBERT V. HOYLAND, only carries it on to v. 10 in 58 discourses). Comp. also FERNBACHER: die Reden des heil. BERNHARD über das Hohelied, deutsch bearbeitet ["The Discourses of ST. BERNARD on the Canticles," rendered into German], Leipz. 1866.

RICHARD A. S. VICTORE, THOMAS AQUINAS, BONAVENTURA, GERSHON and others represent in their Expositiones in Cantic. Canticorum the same mystico-psychological explanation, according to which the Song of Solomon forms a compendium of the science of inward Christian experience, an inexhaustible mine of ideas and fancies as profound as they are arbitrary. DELRIO, DELGADO, SOTOMAYOR, PINEDA, OROCZO. These and other Spanish mystics adopt the same allegorical method in their commentaries with those before named, explaining the "cheeks of the bride," iv. 3, of outward Christianity in good works; her slender neck, vii. 5, of the constancy of the love of Christ; her golden chains, i. 10, of faith; the silver points on the ornaments of gold, i. 11, of the holiness of the walk; the spikenard, i. 12, of redeemed

JOACHIM LANGE, RAMBACH, STARKE and others in the last century seek to connect as far as possible the mystico-doctrinal view of the Song of Solomon with the mystico-spiritual; comp. the following rubric, p. 31.

The BERLEBURG BIBLE (Berleb. 1726 ff.) pays less regard to the doctrinal view of the Song of Solomon or the explanation of the bride as the Church, than to the spiritual, according to which the conditions and stages of progress in the individual Christian life are represented in it.

GUSTAV JAHN, Das Hohelied in Liedern [Solomon's Song in Songs], Halle, 1848, divides the whole into 62 longer or shorter sonnets in which is sung 1) the work of faith; 2) the labor of love; 3) confirmation in grace; and 4) the yea and amen of the bride.

III. p. 2) finds in those concubines the eighty heresies of Christendom prefigured. It is at all events very ancient, e. g. already attested by CASSIODORUS de Inst. divin. liter. c. 5, and is extremely rich in whimsical interpretations, as e. g., that the winter, ii. 11, denotes the sufferings of Christ; the voice of the turtle-dove, ii. 12, the preaching of Paul, the former persecutor of the Christians, etc. Some would regard it as a work of BISHOP PHILO of Carpasus; see e. g. M. STARKE, (Synopsis, Part IV.) closely follows those last mentioned in seeing in the Song of Solomon "a treatise, in which the union of Christ with believers is set forth under the emblem of the most tender love of a bridegroom and bride," or in some sense also a "prophetical book," in which (without chronological order) is represented: "the coming of Messiah in the flesh, the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, the gathering of the N. Test. Church from Jews and Gentiles, as well as the special trials and leadings of the Church," etc.).

MAGN. FR. ROOS, "Fussstapfen des Glaubens Abrahams" [Footsteps of the faith of Abraham], St. 5, 1773 (the bridegroom is Christ, the bride the Church, the daughters of Jerusalem and the queens, concubines and virgins mentioned in vi. 8 represent the various classes of believers; the whole describes the loving intercourse of Christ with His people in this world, etc.; comp. further particulars in DELITZSCH, Hohel. pp. 58–61).

O. v. GERLACH, das Alte Test., etc., Vol. III., 1849. The whole "portrays the various advances and estrangements conducting ever to a more perfect union in the love of Jehovah or Christ and His Church, yet not in the form of a regularly unfolding history but in certain significant transactions, which though related to each other are without any close connection." In the explanation of the details much uncertainty and capricious vacillation.

K. F. KEIL, Lehrbuch der historisch-kritischen Einleitung in's A. T. [Historico-critical Introduction to the O. Test.], 1853, finds as already in HAEVERNICK'S Introduction, Part III., edited by him, "under the allegory of the conjugal love of Solomon and Shulamith" the loving communion between the Lord and His Church, depicted according to its ideal nature, which results from the selection of Israel to be the people of the Lord.

HENGSTENBERG, das Hohelied Salomonis ausgelegt, [the Song of Solomon Expounded], Berl., 1853, makes the only correct "spiritual interpretation" of the Song of Solomon to lie in this that the "heavenly Solomon" must be distinguished from Solomon, the earthly author of the Song, as the object of its descriptions; and the beloved of this heavenly Solomon must be confessed to be the "daughter of Zion," and the whole, therefore, like the 45th Psalm, which is a sort of "compendium of the Song of Solomon," must be allegorically explained of the Messiah and His Church in the Old and the New Test. In the details there is much that is trifling and arbitrary; e. g. the hair of Shulamith compared with a flock of goats, iv. 1, signifies the mass of the nations converted to the Church of the Lord; the navel of Shulamith, vii. 3, denotes "the cup from which the Church refreshes the thirsty (i. e. those longing for salvation) with a noble and refreshing draught;" the sixty and eighty wives of Solomon point to the admission of "the original gentile nations into the Church," because 140 or seven multiplied by two and by ten forms the "signature of the Covenant," and because in the formation of his household from women of the most diverse nations Solomon's purpose was directed "to a symbolic prefiguration of the kingdom of Christ," p. 169, and so on.

H. A. HAHN, das Hohelied von Salomo, übersetzt und erklärt [The Song of Solomon, translated and explained], Bresl., 1852, explains the Song of Solomon as setting forth under a dramatic dress and in the course of six acts, the fundamental thought that "the kingdom of Israel is called to vanquish heathendom finally with the weapons of righteousness and love, and to conduct it back again to the peaceful rest of a loving communion with God." According to this, therefore, Shulamith is a representative of heathendom, and particularly of Japhetic heathendom; and her younger sister, viii. 9 ff., corresponds to Hamitic heathendom, which is at last also to be converted too.

G. HOELEMANN, Die Krone des Hohenlieds [The crown of the Song of Solomon], Leipz. 1856, approaches most nearly to the view of HENGSTENBERG, only he avoids the too specific explanation of minute details and declares it inadmissible—comp. below, p. 43.

c. The Mystico-political or Mystico-historical Interpretation. (This differs from the preceding mainly in that it understands by the bride not the Church but the theocracy of the Old Test., and consequently approximates more to the Jewish allegorical explanation).

AUGUSTIN, de Civit. Dei, l. XVII. c. 8, 13, 20 (ed. BENED. Tom. VII., p. 714 ff.), refers the relation of the two lovers to the theocracy in the Old Test. and its fortunes.

LUTHER, Brevis enarratio in Cantica Canticorum, Opp. ed. Erlang. Vol. XXI., explains—herein differing from many other expressions, in which he adopts the common mystico-doctrinal interpretation—the bride to be the Old Test. theocracy in Israel at the time of its greatest splendor, and makes the whole a eulogy by Solomon of this his kingdom. "Est enim encomium politiæ, quæ temporibus Salomonis in pulcherrima pace floruit. Quemadmodum enim in S. Scriptura, qui scripserunt Cantica, de rebus a se gestis ea scripserunt, sic Salomon per hoc poëma nobis suam politiam commendat, et quasi encomium pacis et præsentis status reipublicæ instituit in quo gratias Deo agit pro summo illo beneficio, pro externa pace, in aliorum exemplum, ut ipsi quoque sic discant Deo gratias agere, agnoscere beneficia summa, et orare, si quid minus recte in imperio acciderit, ut corrigatur*" (p. 278). "Constituit Deum sponsum et populum suum sponsam, atque ita canit, quantopere Deus populum illum diligat, quot et quantis beneficiis eum afficiat et cumulet, denique ea benignitate et clementia eundem complectatur ac foveat, qua nullus unquam sponsus sponsam suam complexus est ac fovit" (p. 276).†

[JOHN BRENTIUS, the Suabian reformer, adopted the same theory. GINSBURG quotes from his 32d homily the following language respecting the Song of Songs: "Carmen encomiasticum, quod de laude regni et politiæ suæ Solomon conscripsit."]

LEON. HUG, "Das Hohelied in einer noch unversuchten Deutung," [The Song of Solomon in a hitherto unattempted explanation], 1813, and "Schutzschrift für seine Deutung des Hohenliedes und desselben weitere Erläuterung" [Defence of his explanation of the Song of Solomon and its further elucidation]. 1815 sees in the bride the kingdom of the ten tribes, in the bridegroom king Hezekiah of Judah designated as Solomon, in the brothers of Shulamith, viii. 8, 9, a party in the house of Judah, in the whole a representation clothed in idyllic form of the longing felt by the kingdom of the ten tribes for reunion with Judah but which those "brothers" opposed. Comp. in opposition to this allegorical explanation favored only by HERBST in WELTE's Einl. in's A. T. [Introduction to the Old Test.], EWALD, p. 40.

ROSENMUELLER, "Ueber des Hohenliedes Sinn und Auslegung [On the meaning and interpretation of the Song of Solomon] in KEIL'S und TZSCHIRNER'S Analekten, Part I., Art. 3, 1830, seeks to establish anew the old Jewish allegorical explanation of the Song of the relation of Jehovah to His people, with reference to the analogy brought forward by Jones: "On the mystical poetry of the Persians and Hindoos" (in the Asiatic Researches, Vol. III.) with the Gitagovinda and the religious poetry of the Soofees—which analogy, however, is more apparent than real, and proves nothing for the far older Song of Solomon; (comp. EWALD, p. 38 ff.; DELITZSCH, p. 66 ff.).

d. The mystico-prophetic or Chronological Interpretation. (Regarding the Song of Solomon as a prophecy of the development of the Church in its several periods, as a sort of Apocalypse, therefore, or as a prophetic compendium of the history of the Church and of heretics).

APONIUS, Expositio Cant. lib. VI., of the seventh century; takes the Song of Solomon to be a continuous picture of the history of revelation from the creation to the final judgment. ["A sentence near the opening of his commentary has apparently induced the assertion that he follows the Chaldee in viewing the Song as of a historico-prophetical character. An inspection of the commentary will show that it contains no trace of the influence of the Chaldee, and that it is not more historico-prophetical than the commentaries of the earlier Christians. APONIUS finds in viii. 1, 13 an indication of the ultimate conversion of the Jews after much suffering; but the germ of a corresponding interpretation of other passages may be traced also in CASSIODORUS."—THRUPP.]

NICOLAUS DE LYRA, Postilla in universa Biblia finds represented in chaps. i.–vi. the history of Israel from Moses to Christ, in chap. vii. and viii. that of Christianity to the time of CONSTANTINE.

G. EDERUS, JACOBUS DE VALENTIA, etc. (see on these and other advocates of the chronological explanation of COCCEIUS, DELITZSCH, p. 56 f.). [The Spanish prelate, JAMES PEREZ of Valentia (1507), "instead of dividing the Song into Old Testament and New Testament portions, viewed it as setting forth throughout, primarily the different phases of Old Testament history, and then also under the figure of these and simultaneously with them the mysteries of redemption. He divides the Song into ten separate canticles, commencing respectively i. 2; i. 12; ii. 8; iii. 6; iv. 1; iv. 16; v. 8; vi. 1; vii. 13. "Return, return, etc.; viii. 5. These severally delineate the promises to the patriarchs; the construction of the tabernacle; the speaking of God from the tabernacle; the carrying of the ark through the wilderness with attendant miracles; Moses' ascent of Pisgah; the death of Moses; the entrance into Canaan; the conquest and partition of Canaan; the conflicts and victories under the Judges; and the prosperity and peace under Solomon. The corresponding events typified by them are the general expectations of the Old Testament saints; the incarnation of Christ; His teaching; His earthly career and miracles; His going up to Jerusalem; His death; the gathering into the Church of the first Jewish converts; the mission of the apostles to the Gentiles; the conflicts and victories of the martyr church; and the prosperity and peace under Constantine." "EDER, rector of the University of Vienna (1582), divided the Song into ten dramas, on the same principle apparently as PEREZ."—THRUPP.]

JOHN COCCEIUS, Cogitationes de Cantico Canticorum Salomonis, Opp. ed. Amsterd., 1673, II. vols. finds, vi. 9, the contest of the Guelphs and Ghibellines; vii. 5 (in the comparison of the bride with the pools at Heshbon the weeping Church of the 15th century as the period of laborious struggle for the reformation of the Church by the great reformatory councils; vii. 6 ff. Canticorum*, 1688, finds, as COCCEIUS had already done, seven periods of the church represented in the Song of Solomon, corresponding with the seven apocalyptic epistles, the seventh of which depicted in chap. viii., is to begin in the year A. D., 2060.

G. F. G. GOLTZ, Das Hohelied Salomonis, eine Weissagung von den letzten Zeiten der Kirche Jesu Christi: [The Song of Solomon, a prophecy of the last times of the Church of Jesus Christ], Berl., 1850, regards in the interest of Irvingite speculations the Song of Solomon as a prophetical book, which sets forth the final fortunes of the Church, "shortly before, during and after the second coming of Christ," and accordingly describes, e. g., in ch. iii. the restoration of the original apostolic constitution of the Church, etc.

e. The Mystico-Mariological Interpretation. (Conceiving Shulamith to be identical with Mary, the mother of God.)

AMBROSE, Sermo de virginitate perpetua S. Mariæ, Opp. ed. Paris, 1642, Vol. IV, explains in addition to the "shut gate" Ezek. xliv., many passages of the Song of Solomon likewise, especially that of the "locked garden" and the "sealed fountain" iv. 12 of the perpetual virginity of Mary.

[GREGORIUS MAGNUS, Expositio super Cantica Canticorum. MOODY STUART says: "The two most distinctive features in his exposition are a great expression of desire for the conversion of the Jews in expounding the passage 'I brought him into my mother's house,' which he interprets of ancient Israel; and the introduction of the Virgin Mary into the song, but it is only to the effect that 'the crown wherewith his mother crowned him' was the humanity which Christ derived from Mary."

MICHAEL PSELLUS, Junior, in the eleventh century "wrote a metrical paraphrase and a prose commentary on the Canticles" in Greek. MOODY STUART says of it: "The Virgin Mary is brought in most fully and zealously; and to the writer nothing can be more clear than that she is 'the dove and the only one' in contrast to the surrounding multitude of queens and princesses."

"A similar view is taken of Cant. vi. 8, 9 in western literature by the ABBOT LUCAS, the epitomizer of Aponius." THRUPP.]

RUPERT V. DEUTZ, in Cant. Canticorum, ll. VII., carries out this suggestion of AMBROSE in a continuous exegesis of the entire book.

DIONYSIUS CARTHUSIANUS, GULIELMUS PARVUS, MICHAEL GHISLERIUS, SALMERON refer according to the hermeneutical rule of the threefold sense, all that is said of the spouse in the Song of Solomon: 1. To the Church; 2. To the individual believing soul; 3. To the holy Virgin.

CORNELIUS A LAPIDE, Commentarii in V. T., Venet., 1730 ff., as the foregoing, only he makes the explanation of the holy Virgin to be the *sensus principalis. [GINSBURG remarks that "he was the first who endeavored to show that this song is a drama in five acts." The themes of these five parts are stated by THRUPP to have been respectively "the infancy of the Christian church, its conflicts with the heathen power, its establishment under Constantine, its sufferings from heresy, and its renovation under the later Fathers."] the Church until the general resurrection is prophetically prefigured. The "virgins" (עֲלָמוֹת i. 3; vi. 8, etc., are the "pure and chaste souls shut up in the dark grave and waiting for the light," because they are so denominated from עָלַם "to be hidden," etc., etc.

["Cantica Canticorum chymice explicata is the title of a book in the library of the British Museum, but the book itself in the lapse of years has gone astray; and we can form no conjecture of its contents except from the words of CARPZOVIUS, that the Alchymists dream that under the shadow of his words Solomon has delineated (in the Song) the whole secret concerning the philosopher's stone." MOODY STUART.]

§ 6. CONTINUATION.

b. The profane-erotic or one-sided Interpretations of the Song as secular history.

That many of the most ancient Christian interpreters regarded Canticles as a Song of worldly love portraying voluptuous and sensual images, is attested by PHILASTRIUS, bishop of Brescia, († about 390) who adduces this view in his list of heresies as one of the heresies of his time. THEODORET († 457), who combats the same opinion, already enumerates several modifications of it. According to one, Shulamith was some bride or concubine of Solomon's, according to another Pharaoh's daughter, 1 Kings iii. 1, according to another still Abishag of Shunem. Among the adherents of this profane-erotic exegesis, THEODORET had doubtless in his eye THEODORE of Mopsuestia († 429), the well-known advocate of a strictly literal method of interpreting Scripture in the sense of the liberal theology of Antioch, and who was reproached by one of his later antagonists, LEONTIUS of Byzantium, for having interpreted the Canticles "libidinose pro sua mente et lingua meretricia," and whose commentary, therefore, together with the rest of his works, was ecclesiastically anathematized by the fifth ecumenical council in the time of the emperor Justinian (553), and has in consequence been lost. During the middle ages this profane mode of explanation entirely ceased even among the theologians of Judaism.* And subsequently in the period of the reformation the reformed humanist, SEBASTIAN CASTELLIO (1544), was the first to venture again to explain the Song as a "colloquium Salomonis cum amica quadam Sulamitha," and on account of this alleged purely worldly character to demand that it should be banished from the canon of Scripture, which led to his own speedy banishment from Geneva, at the instance of CALVIN. In the following century HUGO GROTIUS trod partly at least in his footsteps, who, it is true, theoretically admitted the propriety of a typical and allegorical Messianic interpretation, but in fact continued to stand by a one-sided literal and pretty profane interpretation; also RICHARD SIMON, the well-known free-thinker of the oratorio, to whom the book appeared to be an anthology of erotic pieces of poetry without order or connection—whilst others went further and either warned against reading the book as a publication injurious to morality (SIMON EPISCOPIUS), or thought they must see in it a mere idyl, an eclogue with coarse comparisons like those of Polyphemus in OVID's Metamorphoses (JOHN CLERICUS). Then, soon after SEMLER's and J. D. MICHAELIS' attempts to prove, in a critical way, the impossibility of an allegorical or in general of any spiritual and Messianic view, the eighteenth century brought the beginning of that splintering or crumbling process initiated by LESSING and HERDER (see § 1, Rem. 2), as well as the modern-drama mode of understanding it, the way for which was paved by J. C. JACOBI, v. AMMON, KELLER and others, both resting on the assumption that the contents of the book were decidedly secular and erotic, and both cultivated and variously modified by numerous partisans, scientific and unscientific, down to the most recent times. And then

* Yet the party combated by KIMCHI in his Commentary on account of his assertion that Canticles was a Song of worldly love composed by Solomon in his youth, may possibly have been a rabbi of an earlier period in the middle ages. Comp. EICHHORN, Repertorium, Part XII., p. 283.

 [HENRY, the biographer of CALVIN, gives a full account of this whole affair, Das Leben Johann Calvins, Vol. II., pp. 384–390. He affirms that CASTELLIO withdrew of his own accord from Geneva, and was not banished from the place nor sent away in disgrace. CALVIN, though obliged to express his disapproval of his views, conducted himself with great leniency towards CASTELLIO personally, and gave him on his departure kindly letters to his friends.—TR.]

especially in the dramatic mode of understanding it, besides the assumption of a simple action with but one love in the case (so in particular WEISSBACH), various hypotheses of a more complicated sort are in vogue, according to which two (UMBREIT, EWALD, etc., and generally speaking the majority) or even three pairs of lovers (HITZIG, RENAN) come upon the stage.

SPECIAL BIBLIOGRAPHY.

I. THE OLDER PROFANE-EROTIC INTERPRETERS.

(Until the middle of the 18th century, all proceeding from the simple assumption, that the poem sings of but one loving relation, viz., that between Solomon and Shulamith.)

THEODORE of Mopsuestia (see on his Commentarius in Cant. Canticorum, which is unfortunately entirely lost: LEONTIUS of Byzantium, adversus Nestorianos et Eutychianos, in GALLANDII Bibliotheca Patrum, Vol. XII., and comp. the monographs of SIEFFERT (1827), FRITZSCHE (1836), KLENER and others). ["In the fifth century THEODORE of Mopsuestia ventured on asserting that the bride of the Song of Songs was none other than the Egyptian princess whom Solomon espoused. Whether or no any relics of the interpretation had been traditionally preserved in the East, we find the Jacobite primate ABUL-FARAJ († 1286) allowing in his Arabic history the Song to be outwardly a dialogue between Solomon and Pharaoh's daughter. Otherwise the name of Pharaoh's daughter has not been traced in connection with the Song till the occurrence of a reference to her, though even then 'merely in passing,' in some of the first printed English Bibles in the sixteenth century. [See note to p. 9.] The assertion of DAVIDSON and others after him that she makes her appearance in ORIGEN is most improbable; and after a careful search I feel assured that it is incorrect. I may add that PEREZ unjustly charges the ancient Jews with asserting that the Song was written in praise of her." THRUPP. MOODY STUART says to the same purport: "There may have been oversight on our part, but we have not found in any of these ancient authors [from ORIGEN to BERNARD] the remotest allusion to Pharaoh's daughter, and must confess ourselves quite baffled in a somewhat laborious attempt to trace her introduction into the Song of Solomon."] SEBAST. CASTELLIO, Psalterium reliquaque sacrarum literarum carmina cum argumentis et brevi locorum difficiliorum declaratione, Basil, 1547, labors in general to dress up the contents of Holy Scripture in Latin as classical and smooth as possible, and hence everywhere substitutes respublica for ecclesia, heroës for sancti, genius for angelus, Phœbus for sol; Jupiter or even Gradivus, Armipotens for Deus, lotio for baptismus, etc., and in Canticles in particular makes use of sugary fondling and softly expressions to characterize its amatory contents, e. g., i. 14 f. "Mea columbula ostende mihi tuum vulticulum. Fac ut audiam tuam voculam, nam et voculam venustulam et vulticulum habes lepidulum," ii. 15: "capite nobis vulpeculas, vinearum vastatriculas," etc.—He had already in Geneva, shortly before his exile noted in his Bible at Cant. vii. 1 the words "Sulamitha, amica Salomonis et sponsa," and had declared orally to CALVIN: "que Salomon, quand il fit le chapitre vii, était en folie et conduit par mondanité et non par le Saint Esprit"—for which reason CALVIN, without further ado, charged him with the view that Canticles was a "carmen obscœnum et lascivum, quo Salomo impudicos suos amores descripserit."—Comp. also his complete Latin translation of the Bible: *Biblia V. et N. CASTALIONIS, defensio suarum translationum Bibliorum, Bas., 1562; finally his biography by JAC. MAEHLY, Bas., 1863.)

HUGO GROTIUS, Annotationes in V. T., Par. 1664 (declares the Song of Solomon to be an idyl-like carmen nuptiale, representing the "garritus conjugum inter se, Salomonis et filiæ regis Ægypti, interloquentibus etiam choris duobus tam juvenum quam virginum, qui in proximis thalamo locis excubabant." "Nuptiarum arcana" he says further, "sub honestis verborum involucris hic latent; quæ etiam causa est, cur Hebræi veteres hunc librum legi noluerint nisi a jam conjugio proximis." Besides the sensus literalis, the allegoricus and typicus are also to be duly regarded—a rule, however, which is almost entirely disregarded by him even in the main controlling passages. II. LATER AND LATEST SINCE THE MIDDLE OF THE 18TH CENTURY.

a. The founders of the modern profane erotic view (adhering in the first instance only to the more general results of the negative criticism).

JOHN SOLOMON SEMLER, "Kurze Vorstellung wider die neue Paraphrasin über das Hohelied" [Brief remonstrance against the new paraphrase of the Song of Solomon], 1757, and "De mysticæ interpretationis studio hodie parum utili," 1760.

JOHN DAVID MICHAELIS, in Rob. Lowth. prælectiones de s. poësi Hebræorum notæ et epimetra, Gœtting., 1758; ed. II, 1768 f., rejects, nay ridicules the allegorical interpretation as well of the Church as of the Synagogue; holds the poem to be a mere earthly love-song, and nevertheless supposes that he can relieve or remove the offence of its standing in the canon by seeking to understand its amatory contents of the "casti conjugum amores," instead of "de sponso sponsaque ante nuptias." In the "Neuorientalische und exeget. Bibliothek," Part IV, 1788, he affirms that he would rather venture upon the explanation of the Apocalypse than upon that of the Song of Solomon, and in his "Deutsche Uebersetzung des A. T. mit Anmerkungen für Ungelehrte" [German translation of the O. Test., with remarks for the unlearned] 1769 ff. he leaves it out entirely.

b. The Divisive attempts or fragmentary hypotheses. (Canticles, a conglomerate of erotic songs and fragments of songs).

J. TH. LESSING, Eclogæ regis Salomonis, Lips. 1777, compares the alleged idyls of Canticles to those of Theocritus and Virgil.

J. G. HERDER, "Lieder der Liebe, die ältesten und schönsten aus dem Morgenlande" [Songs of love, the oldest and most beautiful of the Orient], 1778, declares the love depicted in Canticles to be essentially pure and innocent, to be compared with the love of Adam and Eve, whilst they continued naked and sinless in paradise, and censures the profane mode of treating it equally with the allegorical explanation as hypocrisy, and lacking in moral and esthetic purity. (Comp. UMBREIT, in HERZOG's Real Enc. VI. p. 215: "All the lily purity and the full fragrance of the Song has been transferred to his composition, which is in entire sympathy with it, and even the clare-obscure, which is elsewhere made an objection to this extraordinary man, is here an advantage to him as an interpreter; the rosy morning light, which is spread over the Song itself, floats likewise over his exposition, and invests it with its very peculiar charm and fascination. To this belongs even his profound and delicate distribution of the whole into separate voices, accordant only in the breath of love, though here we cannot agree with him," etc.)

J. G. EICHHORN, Einleitung in's A. T. [Introduction to the O. Test.] Vol. III. Leipzig, 1780, ff., agrees in all essential matters with HERDER's esthetically-sublimating and critically-dissecting view: so HUFNAGEL, in EICHHORN's Repertorium, VII, 199; PAULUS and VELTHUSEN, ibid., XVII, 108 ff. (see above, § 1, Rem. 1); JAHN, Einl. in's A. T. II. p. 816 ff.; PAREAU, Institutio interpretis V. T., p. 559; DE WETTE, Einleitung in die Kanon. und Apokryph. Büch. des A. T., Berl., 1817, and repeatedly; AUGUSTI, Grundriss einer Hist.-Krit. Einl. [Outlines of a historico-critical Introduction], 1806, 1827.

J. F. KLEUKER, Sammlung der Gedichte Salomo's, sonst das Hohelied genannt [Collection of the Songs of Solomon, otherwise called the Canticles], 1780, reproduces the view of HERDER with slight modifications, only somewhat more learned and thorough; comp. § 1, Rem. 1.

J. CHR. DÖDERLEIN, Salomo's Prediger und Hoheslied neu übersetzt mit Anmerkungen [Solomon's Ecclesiastes and Canticles, newly translated, with remarks], 1784; 2d edit., 1792, likewise adheres most strictly to HERDER.

VELTHUSEN, "Der Schwesternhandel, eine morgenländische Idyllenkette" [The affair of the sisters, a series of oriental idyls], 1786, and: "Amethyst, Beitrag hist.-kritischer Untersuchungen über das Hohelied" [Amethyst; a contribution to the historico-critical investigation of Canticles] Brunsw., 1786; likewise: Cantilena Cantilenarum Salomonis duplici interpretatione illustrata, Helmst., 1786.

J. C. DÖPKE, Philologisch-kritischer Commentar zum Hohenliede Salomo's, Leipz., 1829, holds that the songs forming the Canticles, "many of which appear in a mutilated condition, were not originally composed and committed to writing at the same time, but were prepared on various occasions, probably preserved in the mouth of the people, and afterwards put together." Comp. in opposition UMBREIT's review in the Stud. und Krit., 1829, II.

ED. ISID. MAGNUS, Kritische Bearbeitung und Erklärung des Hohenliedes Salomo's [Critical treatise on and explanation of the Song of Solomon], Halle, 1842, makes out no less than twenty distinct songs and fragments of songs in the course of the poem; comp. ¿ 1, Rem. 2, as well as DELITZSCH, p. 2 ff.

c. The modern dramatic view. (The Song of Solomon an erotic drama with two or more principal personages, that is, either with a simpler or —by the assumption of several love affairs —a more complicated action).

J. C. JACOBI (Preacher at Celle), Das durch eine leichte und ungekünstelte Erklärung von seinen Vorwürfen gerettete Hohelied [The Song of Solomon freed from objections by a simple and inartificial explanation] 1771. The whole a song in praise of conjugal fidelity, if not strictly dramatic, yet preserving the dialogue form, worthy of a sacred poet, and instructive and salutary for the times of Solomon and his successors.—"Shulamith is by reason of her beauty brought to Solomon's court together with her husband, who has been moved by kindness to divorce her (?); and as they are taking her away from her husband's side and presenting her wine, the king approaches and offers to kiss her. Shulamith is alarmed and cries to her husband: "he is going to kiss me!" etc.—The entire attempt is very awkward and clumsy throughout.

J. W. FR. HEZEL, Neue Uebersetzung und Erklärung des Hohenlieds [New Translation and Explanation of the Song of Solomon], 1777.

CHR. FR. V. AMMON, Salomo's verschmähte Liebe oder die belohnte Treue [Solomon's love disdained, or fidelity rewarded] Leipz., 1795 (likewise important on account of the attempt to show that the poem is strictly one melodramatic whole).

K. FR. STAEUDLIN, über das Hohelied [on the Song of Solomon] in Paulus' Memorabilien, Part 2, p. 178 ff., like Jacobi only in a more delicate and skilful manner he makes Shulamith's country lover come likewise upon the stage, and assigns to him a considerable share in the action, especially from ch. 6 onward.

K. FR. UMBREIT, Lied der Liebe, das älteste und schönste aus dem Morgenlande [Song of love the oldest and most beautiful of the orient] Gött. 1820; 2d Edit. 1828, and Erinnerung an das Hohelied [Reminder of the Song of Solomon], 1839, aims at the utmost simplification of the plot, and likewise the ethical idealizing of its contents in imitation of HERDER's esthetic view; he moreover declares viii. 8–14 to be a spurious addition.

BERNHARD HIRZEL, Das Lied der Lieder oder der Sieg der Treue, übersetzt und erklärt [The Song of Songs, or the triumph of fidelity, translated and explained]; Zürich, 1840, substantially follows EWALD, whose view he seeks to correct in particular passages.

FR. BÖTTCHER, Die ältesten Bühnendichtungen [The oldest stage-poetry], Leipz., 1850; comp. Exeget.-Krit. Aehrenlese z. A. T. [Exegetical and critical gleanings in the Old Test.], 1849, p. 80 ff., and Neue Exeget.-Krit. Aehrenlese [New exeget. crit. gleanings], Part III., 1865, p. 76 ff. He explains the Song of Solomon as "a melodramatic text of a popular stage-play performed in the kingdom of Israel about B. C. 950, directed against the royal house of Solomon and the morals of his harem so menacing to family life, and the exhibition accompanied after the manner of Hindoo, Chinese and even ancient Italian dramas by acting and brief improvisations;" in order to give the whole as burlesque and clownish a character as possible, he makes the shepherd penetrate several times into the royal harem from i. 15 onward (i. 15 ff.; iv. 7 ff.; vii. 12 ff.), treat his comrades, v. 1, to the viands and liquors of the wedding feast, and finally, vii. 12 ff., go off with his beloved, without the king doing anything to prevent it, etc.—Comp. § 2, Remark 1.

G. M. ROCKE, Das Hohelied, Erstlingsdrama aus dem Morgenlande, oder Familiensünden und Liebesweihe. Ein Sittenspiegel für Brautstand und Ehe [The Song of Solomon, a primitive drama from the orient, or family sins and love's devotion. A moral mirror for the betrothed and married], Halle, 1851. He explains a large part of the various scenes as dreams, some of which were directly represented (by apparitions of ghosts), and some narrated subsequently (so, e. g., ii. 8–17; iii. 1–5; v. 2–vi. 3); he takes other sections as v. 8 ff.; vi. 11 ff. to be rhapsodies of Shulamith's romantic and enthusiastic fancy, etc.)

E. MEIER, Das Hohelied, etc. [The Song of Solomon] Tübingen, 1854, returns to the simpler and more moderate view of EWALD.

F. HITZIG, Das Hohelied erklärt [The Song of Solomon explained] in the Kurzgefasstes exeget. Handb. zum A. T. [Condensed exegetical manual to the Old Test.], Part 16, Leipzig, 1855, brings in besides Shulamith and her country lover—comp. § 2, Rem. 1,—also Solomon's wife (e. g., iii. 6–11; iv. 16 ff.), and one of his concubines (vii. 2–11) speaking and acting, thus making the plot as complicated as possible.

E. F. FRIEDRICH, Cantici Canticorum Salomonis poetica forma, 1855, and "Das sogen. Hohelied Salomonis oder vielmehr das pathetische Dramation 'Sulamith' parallelistisch aus dem Hebr. übersetzt" [The so-called Song of Solomon, or rather the pathetic drama 'Shulamith' translated from the Hebrew in parallelisms]. Reprinted from the Altpreussische Monatsschrift, Königsberg, 1866. He seeks with the minutest care to dissect the artistic structure of the dramatic whole in its details, distinguishing four acts with ten scenes and one hundred and sixty chain-links (catellas), or clauses into which the verses are sub-divided; he mingles with it much that is trifling and incongruous without doing justice in any way to the theological character of the poem.

J. G. VAIHINGER, Der Prediger und das Hohelied rhythmisch übersetzt und erklärt [Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon rhythmically translated and explained], Stutt., 1858, follows for the most part the view of EWALD, but with a critically independent attitude.

FR. ED. WEISSBACH, Das Hohelied Salomo's übersetzt, erklärt und in seiner kunstreichen poet. Form dargestellt [The Song of Solomon translated, explained and exhibited in its highly artistic and poetical form], Leipz., 1858; by an acute and thorough criticism of the other erotic and dramatic views he simplifies the action of the piece to the extent of making it refer simply to one loving relation between Solomon and Shulamith, but denies the reality of the transaction (comp. § 4, Rem. 2), and in connection with this refuses also to admit the existence of a more profound ethical idea, or a typical and Messianic significance of the poem).

ERNEST RENAN, Le cantique des cantiques, traduit de l' Hebreu, avec une étude sur le plan, l' âge et le caractère du poëme, Paris, 1860, 2d edit., 1861, approaches, most nearly to the views of BÖTTCHER and HITZIG, only he fantastically remodels them after his own fashion, and thus brings out a romantic sentimental pastoral piece, in which even a ballet is introduced (vii. 2 ff.: "une danseuse du Harem"). Comp. § 2, Rem. 1.

§ 7. CONCLUSION.

a. The typical-Messianic view, or that based upon its position in the redemptive history.

The two principal modes of viewing the Song of Solomon thus far considered, the purely allegorical as well as the one-sided treatment of it as secular history, not only have the suspicious circumstance against them that the greatest vacillation prevails in shaping the views of their adherents in detail from the earliest periods to the present, and that no one of these views commends itself at first sight as a perfectly satisfactory solution of the enigma; but both of them introduce into the text of the Song strange and unproved assumptions which are in flat contradiction with its peculiar character both internally and externally. The allegorical explanation, however it may be modified in its details, makes the utterly inconceivable and improbable, nay, monstrous assumption, that by the "king Solomon" of the song is meant not the historical ruler so named, but a heavenly prototype of the same name, nay, in actual fact, no other than Jehovah Himself, and then further involves itself in inextricable difficulties in its explanation of particulars, e. g., of the sixty queens and eighty concubines of this heavenly Solomon, as well as of his mother, his sedan and crown, etc. To which is to be added further the suspicious circumstance that in every other instance in which the figurative language of the Old Test. symbolizes the relation of Jehovah to Israel as a marriage or betrothal, it is the bride that is represented in the least favorable light, nay, that is mostly described as a harlot* (so particularly in Hosea, Jeremiah, Ezekiel; comp. above, § 4, p. 16), whilst in the Song of Solomon the precise opposite of this is the case [?]. The profane secular-history explanation not only sees itself driven to various artificial hypotheses and auxiliary hypotheses, especially to the introduction of one, two, three or more subordinate persons, whose entrance upon the scene there is nothing in the text to indicate, and which, as particularly the "shepherd" or "herdsman," are introduced as apparitions, suddenly and without any thing to prepare the way for their coming; it also leaves totally unexplained how this mere worldly love-song, in which Solomon is alleged to be represented in so extremely disadvantageous a light as the seducer of female innocence, could have found admission to the canon of Scripture, and this with a title, which prefixed to it with commendatory emphasis the very name of Solomon himself, the great royal singer and sage (comp. § 1 and 3)! Against the allegorical or directly Messianic view testimony is borne by the too earthly and even sinful colors, in which Solomon, the historical Solomon of the 1st book of Kings, is depicted as the hero of the piece. The one-sided secular history explanation with its directly anti-Solomonic and consequently also anti-Messianic tendencies is refuted by the fact that Solomon's perseverance in his adulterous designs and polygamous desires in the face of Shulamith's innocence, cannot be shown to be a matter belonging to the subject of the piece by a single decisive proof-passage, but that on the contrary it is evident to an unbiassed exegesis that he and no other is Shulamith's lover, and the real object of the dramatic representation is his being brought back from the dizzy heights of a harem's voluptuous morals, to the morally pure and inviolable standpoint of conjugal chastity, love and fidelity.

Since the typical reference of the loving relation depicted in the piece to Christ and His Church, enters into combination with this simple and worthy view in the most unconstrained manner and of its own accord as it were, as has been already briefly intimated § 4, and as the exposition of the Song will have to show more in detail, this may be designated the typical-Messianic, or—since every element of the redemptive history possesses of itself, and by an inner necessity, a typical virtue which points forwards and upwards—the redemptive-history view. Attempts to establish and carry it out were probably already made here and there in the ancient church, especially as New Testament passages, such as above all Christ's declaration respecting Himself as a greater than Solomon (Matt. xii. 42; comp. Matt. vi. 28; Rev. iii. 20), appear to favor it rather than the allegorical or the direct Messianic interpretation. But the greatly preponderating inclination of the fathers, which soon attained exclusive sway, to plunge immediately and at once into the spiritual sense, must have stifled in its birth every attempt to assert at the same time a historical sense, and branded it with the same anathema as the profane-erotic interpretation of THEODORE of Mopsuestia. It was not until after the middle ages, therefore, that more numerous and important attempts were made to unite the historical with the more profound spiritual meaning by the intermediate link of the type, and attempts not barely of the half-way, external sort, like that of GROTIUS (see § 6), but such as were seriously meant and worthily maintained. Thus above all that of the noble Spanish mystic, LOUIS DE LEON († 1591), who had it is true to pay the penalty in the prisons of the inquisition of his departure from the broadly trodden path of the traditional allegorizing, as well as his choice of the Spanish language for the composition of his commentary; and further the like attempts of the reformed interpreters, MERCIER, LIGHTFOOT and LOWTH, as well as of the famous Catholic preacher and historian BOSSUET. VON HOFMANN still tries to maintain the assumption common to these former adherents of the typical view, that the bride of the Song of Solomon was a daughter of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, whilst DELITZSCH and NAEGELSBACH who in the main agrees with him, espouse the view, which is without doubt to be preferred by reason of vii. 1, that the bride was an Israelitish country girl from Shunem.

LUIS DE LEON (Ludovicus Legionensis), Cantar de los Cantares—a translation and explanation of the Song of Solomon in classical Spanish, written about 1569. (According to the extracts given by C. A. WILKENS, Fray Luis de Leon, p. 206 ff., and the remarks by which he characterizes it, this expositor every where gives most prominence to the historical sense which he grasps with sound esthetic feeling and artless simplicity. "Only in individual passages is the veil lifted and the love of Jehovah to His people, of Christ to the soul, of believers to the Lord, appears as in the highest sense the rightful bearer of all the attributes heaped upon human love. For pure human love is the noblest copy of the divine. They are alike in their mutual aspirations, alike in their beginning, nutriment, development, operation, end; as also earthly beauty is the shadow of the eternally beautiful. Thus, too, the reception of the book into the canon is explained. The divine Spirit has in condescension to human weakness veiled the spiritual beauties of good things yet unknown in figures of things which are real, lovely and well known. We should learn to joy over the distant from the joy which the near affords, and thus suffer ourselves to be drawn to Him, who loves us above all."—FRAY LUIS conceives the theme of the book to be simply "the bliss and pain of love" described in the form of a pastoral poem, in which king Solomon is represented as a shepherd, and his bride Shulamith, the daughter of the Egyptian king, as a shepherdess. Their love is depicted in the nicest and most perfect manner: in other amatory poems there is only found a shadow of the feeling and bliss of love, here love is described in primal perfection even to the most subtle features of its being.—As the inquisition at Valladolid took offence at this treatise on Canticles, partly on account of its contents, and partly because it was written in Spanish, it remained unprinted, and LEON published subsequently, after he had languished five years in prison, for his complete justification a Latin treatise "FR. L. LEGIONENSIS, In Cantica Canticorum Salomonis explanatio" (Salom., 1580), in which, besides the historical sense, he also stated the spiritual more fully, and this partly in the allegorical, partly the typical method. Upon his bringing up Pharaoh's daughter to the house that he had prepared for her, 1 Kings ix. 24, he seemeth to have made this Song. For though the best and the most proper aim of it was at higher matters than an earthly marriage, yet doth he make his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter a type of that sublime and spiritual marriage betwixt Christ and His church. Pharaoh's daughter was a heathen and a stranger natively to the church of Israel; and withal she was a black-moor, as being an African, as Cant. i. 4, 5 alludeth to it; and so she was the kindlier type of what Solomon intended in all particulars.—Tr.]

Rob. Lowth, De Sacra poesi Hebræorum prælectiones academicæ; Oxon., 1753, 1763 (prœl. 30 ff.) [In the scheme and divisions of the book he adopts the view of Bossuet to be stated presently. In regard to its spiritual meaning he contends that it is neither a "continuous metaphor," nor a "parable properly so called," but a "mystical allegory in which a higher sense is superinduced upon a historical verity." The bride he decides, though not without hesitation, to have been Solomon's favorite wife, the daughter of Pharaoh; his marriage with an Egyptian being an apt adumbration of the Prince of peace, who espouses to Himself a church composed of Gentiles and of aliens. Her name he expresses in the form Solomitis, as derived from Solomon, like Caia from Caius, and intended to be suggestive of the higher sense of the Song.—Tr.]

Jacques-Benigne Bossuet, Libri Salomonis, Proverbia, Ecclesiastes, Cantic. Canticorum, Sapientia, Ecclesiasticus, cum notis, etc. Paris, 1693. [He supposes the Song to be divided into seven parts, corresponding to the seven days of the marriage feast. It commences with the bride's being brought home to her husband's house on the evening which, according to Jewish reckoning, ushers in the first day. Then the successive mornings are indicated by the adjuration of the bridegroom as he leaves his chamber, ii. 7; iii. 5; viii. 4, or by the admiring language of the choir of virgins as the bride herself appears, iii. 6; viii. 5; vi. 10. The evenings are either expressly mentioned, iii. 1; v. 2, or may be inferred, ii. 6; viii. 3. The seventh day is shown to be the Sabbath by the fact of the bridegroom coming in public attended by his bride, viii. 5, instead of going forth alone to his occupation as he had done previously.—Tr.]

London, 1768.] He explains like those before named, the whole as a celebration of Solomon's marriage with a daughter of the king of Egypt, and leaves the profounder spiritual meaning almost entirely out of sight. [He finds two queens in the course of the Song—the former principal queen who speaks, iii. 1, etc., and the daughter of Pharaoh who is henceforth made her "equal in honor and privileges," and who is "frequently mentioned afterwards in history, while the other is passed over in total silence," this new marriage being an apt representation of the "conduct of the Messiah towards the Gentile and Jewish churches."—Tr.]

English Commentaries on the Song of Solomon.

[Venerable BEDE wrote seven books on the Canticles. The first is "a controversial preface warning his readers against the Commentary of JULIAN of Eclanum which that writer had made a vehicle for his Pelagian doctrines." This betrayed WILLIAMS (and GINSBURG, who copies him) into the error of supposing that the whole " work was intended as a defence of the doctrines of grace against the Pelagians." The seventh book "comprises a series of extracts from all parts of GREGORY's writings, bearing upon the Song." In the other five books "he has followed the footsteps of the fathers, leaving the works of GREGORY intact."

"The Commentary of FOLIOT, Bishop of London in the 12th century, with the Compendium of ALCUIN, was printed in 1638, and is repeatedly referred to by Dr. GILL."

SCOTUS is favorably spoken of by POOLE, Synopsis Crit., Vol. II., Pref., as not one of the last to be named of this period; "author non inter postremos memorandus."

HENRY AINSWORTH (a Brownist divine), Annotations upon the five books of Moses, the book of the Psalms, and the Song of Songs or Canticles, London, 1639. This volume has done much to shape the current allegorical exposition of the Song. It is accompanied by a metrical paraphrase.

THOMAS BRIGHTMAN, Commentary on the Canticles, London, 1644. "He regards the book as prophetic, and divides it into two parts; the first, chap. i.—iv. 6, describes the condition of the legal church from the time of David to the death of Christ: and the second, chap. iv. 7—viii. 14, the state of the evangelical church from A. D. 34 to the second coming of Christ."

BISHOP PATRICK'S Paraphrase and Annotations on this Song were published in 1700; MATTHEW HENRY'S Exposition a few years after.

WHISTON published an Essay in 1723, charging the Song of Solomon with containing "from the beginning to the end marks of folly, vanity and looseness," maintaining "that it was written by Solomon when he was wicked, and foolish, and lascivious, and idolatrous," and urging its rejection from the sacred canon.

JOHN GILL, An Exposition of the book of Solomon's Song commonly called Canticles, London, 1728. "A vast treasure of varied learning, sound doctrine and spiritual experience; but it is neither sufficiently condensed, nor is it so digested by the author as to present to the reader a clear idea of his own interpretation." He pushes the allegory to the furthest extreme, and attaches every sense to the words which they can possibly bear. The first edition contains a translation of the Targum upon this book. Another comment by the same author is contained in his Exposition of the Old and New Testament.

JOHN WESLEY, in his Explanatory notes upon the Old Testament, Bristol, 1765, also defends the allegorical interpretation of this book, and especially disallows its reference to Solomon and Pharaoh's daughter.

[GIFFORD], A Dissertation on the Song of Solomon, with the original text divided according to the metre [upon BISHOP HARE'S hypothesis], and a poetical version, 1751. He "considers the poem as a pastoral composed by Solomon as the amusement of his lighter hours, just after his nuptials with Pharaoh's daughter, and before God had so remarkably appeared to him and given him that divine wisdom, for which he was afterwards so eminent."

[BISHOP PERCY], The Song of Solomon, newly translated from the original Hebrew, with a commentary and annotations, London, 1764. He confines himself to the literal sense, and adopts substantially the view of BOSSUET that it was written on the occasion of Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter, and is divided into seven parts answering to the seven days of the wedding feast.

MRS. BOWDLER, Song of Solomon paraphrased, with an introduction, containing some remarks on a late new translation (PERCY'S) of this sacred poem; also a commentary and notes critical and practical, Edinburgh, 1775.

DURELL, Critical remarks on Job, Proverbs, Psalms, Ecclesiastes and Canticles, 1772, follows the same general theory, but "totally excludes any allegorical or spiritual design."

T. WILLIAMS, The Song of Songs, which is by Solomon, a new translation with a commentary and notes, London, 1801. Republished in Philadelphia, 1803. Adopts like the preceding the general hypothesis of BOSSUET and LOWTH, and takes note of the spiritual meaning throughout.

JOHN MASON GOOD, Song of Songs, or sacred Idyls translated, with notes critical and explanatory, London, 1803. Containing a literal prose translation and a very elegant metrical version. "A work of great beauty, in which the author allows and defends the allegorical, but confines himself to the literal sense." He "regards the entire song as a collection of distinct idyls upon one common subject, and that the loves of the Hebrew monarch and his fair bride."

WILLIAM DAVIDSON, Brief outline of an examination of the Song of Solomon, with remarks critical and expository, London, 1817. He interprets "the Song of Solomon of the Christian church from the time of John the Baptist."

SCOTT'S Notes in his Commentary on the Bible follow the current allegorical exposition, and are largely drawn from BISHOP PATRICK.

ADAM CLARKE eschews the allegorical interpretation, and assigns as his reasons: "1. Because we do not know that it is an allegory. 2. If one, the principles on which such allegory is to be explained do nowhere appear." Appended to his commentary is a translation of the Targum or Chaldee paraphrase of this book; also the Hindoo mystical poem, the Gitagovinda, which, agreeably to the suggestion of SIR WILLIAM JONES, he regards as illustrative of the Song of Solomon.

B. BOOTHROYD, The Hebrew Scriptures of the Old Testament without points after the text of KENNICOTT, accompanied with English Notes, critical, philological and explanatory, 2 vols. 4to. The notes consist for the most part of extracts from preceding commentators, chiefly PERCY, GREEN, GOOD, HODGSON, and HARMER.

JOHN FRY, Canticles, a new translation with notes, London, 1811. The book is regarded as a collection of idyls, some of which were suggested by the marriage of Solomon, others by different domestic scenes in humble life; but all are parables of the love of Christ and His Church.

CHARLES TAYLOR in the Biblical Fragments (Nos. 345-453) appended to CALMET'S Dictionary, 1838. Well characterized by MOODY STUART: "His translation and arrangement of the Song of Songs—relating merely to its outward structure as Solomon's marriage festival—evince great research, abundant ingenuity, the utmost delicacy and refinement of feeling, along with a most exuberant fancy."

W. NEWMAN, Solomon's Song of Songs, a new translation, London, 1839.

PYE SMITH in his "Scripture Testimony to the Messiah," 1847, "regards this Song as a pastoral eclogue or a succession of eclogues representing in the vivid color of Asiatic rural scenery the honorable loves of a newly married bride and bridegroom." This led to a controversy between him and DR. BENNETT in the Congregational Magazine for 1837 and 1838, respecting the proper interpretation of the Song. A subsequent article in the same periodical (for 1838, p. 471 ff.) declares that there is "no more reason for its spiritual interpretation than for its application to the revival of letters, the termination of feudalism, or any other gratifying circumstance in civil or political life." KITTO in his Pictorial Bible and in his Daily Bible Illustrations "presents much useful information on the Song of Solomon."

SAMUEL DAVIDSON, (The Text of the Old Testament Considered, London, 1856, and Introduction to the Old Testament, 1862) adopts the shepherd hypothesis, regards it as a purely amatory poem, having neither an allegorical nor a typical sense, and written not by Solomon, but by a citizen of the northern kingdom twenty-five or thirty years after Solomon's death.

A. MOODY STUART, An Exposition of the Song of Solomon, London, 1857 (republished Philadelphia, 1869). The peculiarity of this eminently devout and spiritual commentary is the parallel instituted and carried out in a most ingenious and elaborate manner between the Song of Solomon and the Gospels and Acts of which it is regarded as a prophetic epitome. He regards i. 2—ii. 7 as descriptive of the period immediately before and after the birth of Christ; ii. 8—iii. 5 from the appearance of John till the baptism of Jesus; iii. 6—v. 1 from Christ's return out of the wilderness till the last supper; v. 2—viii. 5 from the agony in the garden till the evangelizing of the Samaritans; viii. 5-14 from the calling of the Gentiles till the close of revelation.

BENJAMIN WEISS (a converted Jew), The Song of Songs unveiled, a new translation and exposition of the Song of Solomon, Edinburgh, 1859. He conceives it to be "half historical and half prophetical," and to embrace the entire interval from the dedication of the tabernacle of Moses to the resurrection of Christ and the formation of churches among the Gentiles.

CHRISTIAN GINSBURG, The Song of Songs translated from the original Hebrew, with a commentary historical and critical, London, 1857, and in his article on Solomon's Song in the third Edition of KITTO'S Cyclopedia, advocates the shepherd hypothesis. "This song records the history of an humble but virtuous woman, who after having been espoused to a man of like humble circumstances, had been tempted in a most alluring manner to abandon him, and to transfer her affections to one of the wisest and richest of men, but who successfully resisted all temptations, remained faithful to her espousals, and was ultimately rewarded for her virtue." The historical sketch of the exegesis of the book is very full and valuable, though warped by the peculiar views of the writer.

JOSEPH FRANCIS THRUPP, The Song of Songs, a revised translation, with introduction and commentary, Cambridge, 1862, divides the Song into six groups; see note on p. 11. "The theme of the first group is the anticipation of Christ's coming; the second represents the waiting for that blessed time; in the third he is arrived, and we have there the description of the espousal and its fruits. The fourth group delineates the subsequent bodily departure of the Bridegroom from his Bride; the fifth his spiritual presence with her; and the sixth their complete and final reunion." "The earlier half of the Song presents to us only those glories which older seers had in various ways also heralded. With respect to the latter half of the Song the case is different. The distinctness with which it is there unfolded that the coming of the Messiah will not of itself be the final termination of all earthly expectation and anxiety is unparalleled not merely in all earlier Scripture, but throughout the whole of the Old Testament. Nowhere else do we find a passage which speaks as Cant. v. 2–8 speaks of a withdrawal of the Messiah from the church for whose salvation He has once appeared." This he accounts for by supposing it based on a typical application of the translation of Elijah. The untimely removal of this distinguished prophet, who was fondly styled "the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof," and the painful void created by his departure, foreshadowed a similar experience in the case of Messiah, the last and greatest of the prophets, who should in like manner forsake His sorrowing people for a season, though with the view of ultimately returning never to leave them more. The Song he supposes to have been written a century or more after the death of Solomon by a member of one of the prophetical schools in the kingdom of the ten tribes.

ISAAC TAYLOR, The Spirit of the Hebrew Poetry; republished in New York, 1862, devotes chap. x. to Solomon and the Song of Songs.

CHR. WORDSWORTH, The Books of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon in the authorized version, with notes and introductions (Vol. IV. Part III. of his Commentary on the Bible), London, 1868. He regards it as a prophetic allegory, suggested by the occasion of Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter, and descriptive of "the gathering of the world into mystical union with Christ, the consecration of the world into a church espoused to Him as the Bride."

W. HOUGHTON, Translation of the Song of Solomon, and short explanatory notes (London, 1865), in which, as stated by the American editor of SMITH'S Dictionary of the Bible, the Song is viewed as secular and the theme conceived to be the fidelity of chaste love.

American Commentaries.

Of the discussions of this book which have appeared in this country, the most noteworthy are the following:

MOSES STUART, in his Critical History and Defence of the Old Testament Canon (Andover, 1845), devotes pp. 364–385 to a consideration of the Canticles. He regards it as "expressing the warm and earnest desire of the soul after God in language borrowed from that which characterizes chaste affection between the sexes," and as applicable to the church only in so far as what pertains to individuals who are pious is common to the entire body of believers. He thinks the book to be so peculiarly Oriental in its imagery and style of thought, that while adapted to the religious wants of those amongst whom it originated, and probably reserved for a new period of usefulness in the East when Christianized, it is of inferior value to occidental Christians generally.

GEORGE R. NOYES, A new Translation of the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and the Canticles, with introductions and notes, chiefly explanatory, Boston, 1846. He conceives the book to be a collection of amatory songs "written by some Jewish poet, either in the reign of Solomon or soon after it," and without any "express moral or religious design."

CALVIN E. STOWE, in the Biblical Repository for April, 1847, gives a partial translation of the Song of Solomon, and defends its allegorical interpretation.

GEORGE BURROWES, A Commentary on the Song of Solomon, Philadelphia, 1853; also an article on the Song of Solomon in the Princeton Review for October, 1849. "The Song is a continuous and coherent whole, illustrating some of the most exalted and delightful exercises of the believing heart." He deems it "more profitable and natural in meditating on this book, to view the bride as the representative of the individual believer rather than of the whole church. As the church is a collection of individuals, its state must be that of the members composing it; and no distinction can be drawn between the love of Jesus for the collective body and His love for the several persons constituting the whole mass." The illustrations from Oriental manners and parallel passages in ancient and modern literature are particularly copious and judicious.

LEONARD WITHINGTON, Solomon's Song translated and explained, Boston, 1861. The bride of the Song is the daughter of an Arab Sheikh (vii. 1), whom Solomon married, as he did a multitude of other princesses from the little tribes around Palestine, with the "wish of spreading the Hebrew empire and religion through the vicinity. And he writes this poem to show how pure his felicity, how happy his marriage with a rural bride taken from a pagan nation, whom nevertheless he brings under the influence of the true religion, and hopes to convert to the true faith, and make one of the instruments of promoting the glory of his peaceful kingdom. But the occasional song was exalted by the providence of God into a higher purpose. That purpose was mainly and primarily to foreshow the formation and union of the Gentile church with Christ, when a more sublime and spiritual religion should be presented."

A. R. FAUSSET and B. M. SMITH, The Poetical Books of the Holy Scriptures with a critical and explanatory commentary, Philadelphia, 1867. Largely based upon the commentary of MOODY STUART, whose divisions and historical application it adopts.

Metrical Translations.

The metrical translations of the Song of Solomon are very numerous. In addition to the Latin paraphrases by A. JOHNSON, (Physician to Charles I.) and J. KER (Professor of Greek in Aberdeen, 1727) commended by MOODY STUART for their elegance, and an anonymous English paraphrase "The loves of the Lord with his troth-plight spouse" quoted and spoken of with approbation by the same author, it has been versified (either separately or combined with the Psalms or other poetical portions of the Old Testament), by WILLIAM BALDWIN, 1549; J. SMITH, 1575; ROBERT FLETCHER, 1586; DUDLEY FENNER, 1587; MARKHAM, 1596; ARGALL, 1621; AINSWORTH, 1623; SANDYS, 1641; BOYD, 1644; R. SMITH, 1653; HILDERSHAM, 1672; T. S. (London) 1676; WOODFORD, 1679; HILLS, 1681; LLOYD, 1682; MASON, 1683; REEVE, 1684; BEVERLEY, 1687; BARTON, 1688; FLEMING, 1691; STENNETT, 1700; SYMSON, 1701; RALPH ERSKINE, 1736; TANSUR, 1738; ELIZABETH ROWE, 1739; BLAND, 1750; JOHNSON, 1751; GIFFORD, 1751; BARCLAY, 1767; ANN FRANCIS, 1781; GOOD, 1803; MASON, 1818; TAYLOR, 1820; a late graduate of Oxford, 1845; Metrical Meditations, 1856. Another is announced as forthcoming by MR. WILLIAM S. RENTOUL, of Philadelphia, to accompany his edition of MOODY STUART's commentary.

THE

SONG OF SOLOMON.

TITLE:

I. 1 THE SONG OF SONGS, WHICH IS BY SOLOMON.

FIRST SONG.

The first time the lovers were together at the royal palace (in or near) Jerusalem.

(CHAP. I. 2—II. 7).

FIRST SCENE:

SHULAMITH AND THE DAUGHTERS OF JERUSALEM.

(CHAP. I. 2–8).

SHULAMITH.

2 [1]Let him kiss me with kisses[2] of his mouth,
[3]for better is thy love than wine!
3 In fragrance thine unguents are good;[4]
[5]an unguent[6] poured forth is thy name,[7] therefore virgins love thee.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1] [WICLIFFE: The Church of the coming of Christ speaketh, saying. MATTHEWS: The voice of the Church. COVERDALE: O that thy mouth would give me a kiss, for thy breasts are more pleasant than wine, and that because of the good and pleasant savor.].

[2] On the combination of the kindred words נשק and נשיקה. Comp. 1 Kin. i. 12; ii. 16; Isa. i. 13; viii. 10; Jon. i. 10, 16, and generally EWALD, Lehrbuch, § 281 a, [GREEN's Heb. Gram. § 271, 3].

[3] [WICLIFFE: The voice of the Father.]

[4] [THRUPP's proposed emendation לריח שמני קטורים "like as the scent which cometh from incenses," is nothing but ingenious trifling, and has not even the merit of being good Hebrew.—TR.]

[5] [WIC. The voice of the Church.]

[6] Observe the assonance in שֶׁמֶן and שֵׁם which is probably intentional. [THRUPP: as ointment thou art, by thy name, poured forth.]

[7] In regard to the construction of the words שֶׁמֶן תּוּרַק שְׁמֶךָ four views are possible: 1. שֵׁם is taken as the subject, and תּוּרַק as 3 pers. fem. here employed because שֵׁם is exceptionally used as a feminine after the analogy of the Ethiopic (so EW.: "thy name is poured out as an ointment;" VAIH.: "as the fragrance of balsam thy name pours itself forth," etc.) 2. שֶׁמֶן is regarded as the subject, which is here exceptionally treated as feminine, and to which תּוּרַק belongs as a relative clause; "an unguent, which is shed forth, is thy name" (so the Septuag., Vulg., LUTH. and the generality of interpreters). 3. שֶׁמֶן is taken as a masc., but the form תּוּרַק is regarded as a hardened form for יוּרַק (after the analogy of Isa. xliv. 28; Eccles. x. 15), and accordingly translated as before (HITZIG). 4. תּוּרַק is held to be the 2 pers. sing. fut. Hophal with a double accusative: "thou art poured forth in respect to thy name as ointment," i. e., thou, or more precisely thy name, diffusest a noble fragrance, like a box of ointment which is emptied of its contents (so J. H. MICHAELIS: "sicut oleum effunderis nomine tuo;" HENGSTENB., WEISSB.). This last construction is to be preferred as grammatically the best established, while it agrees in sense substantially with Nos. 2 and 3.

SHULAMITH AND THE DAUGHTERS OF JERUSALEM (in responsive song).

4 Draw me!—after thee will we run!—[1]
[2]The king has brought me into his chambers![3]
We will exult and be glad in thee, will commend[4] thy love beyond wine!—
Rightly[5] do they love thee!

SHULAMITH.

5 [6]Black I am, but [7]comely, ye daughters of Jerusalem, as the tents of Kedar, as the tent-cloths of Solomon.
6 Look[8] not at me, because[9] I am dusky,[10] because the sun has scorched[11] me; [12]my mother's sons were angry[13] with me, made me keeper of the vineyards;—
mine own vineyard I have not kept.[14]

(Looking around for Solomon).

7 [15]Tell me, thou whom my soul loveth, where[16] feedest thou?
where makest thou (thy flock) to recline at noon?
For[17] why should I be as one straying[18] by the flocks of thy companions?

DAUGHTERS OF JERUSALEM.

8 [19]If thou know not,[20] fairest among women, go forth in the footprints of the flock and feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents.

1 [MATT. Yea, that same moveth me also to run after thee.]
2 [MATT. The spousess to her companions.]
3 [COV., CRANMER, BISHOPS: "privy chamber;" DOWAY: "cellars," altered in later editions to "store-rooms."]
4 Upon הִזְכִּיר prop. "to mention, bring to remembrance," then "to mention with praise, celebrate," comp. Ps. xx. 8; Isa. xlviii. 1; lxiii. 7; also Ps. xlv. 18; 1 Chron. xvi. 4, where it is parallel to הוֹדָה thank, praise.
5 [COV. Well is them that love thee. ENG. VER. The upright, Marg. uprightly. NOYES, BURROWES: sincerely.]
6 [WIC. The Church, of her tribulations. MAT. The voice of the Church in persecution. COV., CRAN. I am black, (O ye daughters of Jerusalem) like as the tents of the Cedarenes and as the hangings of Solomon; but yet I am fair and well-favored withal. GINSBURG: swarthy.]
7 [WITHINGTON: fair; BURROWES: lovely.]
8 [COV. marvel; DOWAY: consider; WILLIAMS, NOYES: gaze; WITH. scorn; GINSBURG: disdain.]
9 שֶׁ signifies in both instances, in שֶׁאֲנִי and in שֶׁשְּׁזָפַתְנִי not "for," but "for the reason that," "because" (εἰς ἐκεῖνο ὅτι); comp. Ex. ii. 2. The second clause is therefore co-ordinated with the first, although explanatory of it (comp. WEISSB. in loc.)
10 [COV.: so black. E. VER. black; DOWAY: brown; WEISS: swarthy; BUR., THRUPP: dark.] On שְׁחַרְחֹרֶת blackish, dusky (not "very black, deep black," as HITZ. and formerly EWALD too would have it), comp. on ver. 5 above [GREEN'S Heb. Gram., § 188].
11 שָׁזַף is not "look upon" [so E. V.; COV. shined; WILL. beamed; THRUPP: fiercely scanned; WEISS: glanced] (Septuag. παρέβλεψε, comp. Job xx. 9), but is here—שָׁדַף (Gen. xli. 23) "scorch, blacken," the sense already expressed by AQUILA (συνέκαυσέ με) and the Vulg. (decoloravit me) [GOOD: discolored; BUR., GINS. browned], and retained by most of the recent interpreters (in opposition to ROSENM., HENGSTENB., WEISSB.).
12 [MAT. The voice of the Synagogue.]
13 נִחֲרוּ either Niph. of חרר to burn, glow, (so EW., MEIER, HITZ.), or more probably from חרה (so that the sing. would be נִחֲרָה or נֶחֱרָה); for the Niph. of חרר always elsewhere means "to be dried, parched" (Ps. lxix. 4; cii. 4, etc.), whilst the meaning demanded here is "to be angry, wroth." Comp. GESENIUS' Lexicon and WEISSB. in loc. [COV.: had evil will.]
14 [COV.: Thus was I fain to keep a vineyard, which was not mine own.]
15 [WIC., MAT. The voice of the Church to Christ.]
16 אֵיכָה elsewhere how? [which WEISS. retains] is here—אֵיפֹה where? so too 2 Kin. vi. 13, K'thibh, whilst the Kri has אֵיכוֹ.
17 שַׁלָּמָה properly "for why" (comp. אֲשֶׁר לָמָּה, Dan. i. 10), a fuller expression for the simple לָמָּה why, as in Job xxxiv. 27, אֲשֶׁר עַל־כֵּן stands for עַל־כֵּן, Ps. xlv. 3. The sense is correctly given by the Sept. and Syr., which here and in Dan. i. 10 translate "that not, lest" (μήποτε). [COV.: and that. The critical conjecture mentioned by WILLIAMS, that this word should be pointed as a proper name שְׁלֹמֹה O Solomon is unworthy of attention.—TR.]
18 [WIC. go vagrant; COV. lest I go wrong and come unto the flocks of thy companions; E. VER. one (GENEV. she) that turneth aside; GOOD, PERCY, CLARKE: wanderer; WILLIAMS, FRY: stranger; TAYLOR: rover; GINSB.: roaming; E. VER. Marg. one that is veiled, so NOYES, WEISS., THRUPP.]
19 [WIC., MAT. The voice of Christ to the Church.]
20 לָךְ is here added inasmuch as the action returns upon its subject (comp. Prov. ix. 12; and ii. 6; viii. 14 below), so in general EWALD, Lehrb. § 315 a [GREEN'S Heb. Chrest. note on Isa. xl. 9.]

SECOND SCENE:

SOLOMON AND SHULAMITH.

(CHAP. I. 9—II. 7).

SOLOMON.

9 To my horse[1] in Pharaoh's chariots
I liken[2] thee, my dear.[3]
10 Comely are thy cheeks with chains,[4] thy neck with beads.[5] 11 Chains[6] of gold will we make thee with points[7] of silver.

SHULAMITH.

12 [8]Whilst the king is at his table,[9] my spikenard yields its fragrance.
13 A bundle[10] of myrrh is my beloved[11] to me, that lodges between my breasts.
14 A cluster of the cyprus-flower[12] is my beloved to me, in the vineyards of Engedi.

SOLOMON.

15 [13]Lo! thou art fair, my dear, lo! thou art fair; thine eyes are doves.

SHULAMITH.

16 [14]Lo! thou art fair, my beloved, yea sweet; yea our couch is green.[15]
17 The beams[16] of our houses are cedars, our wainscot[17] is cypresses.[18]
II. 1. [19]I am (only) a wildflower of Sharon, a lily of the valleys.

SOLOMON.

2 As a lily among thorns,
so is my dear among the daughters.

1 [WIC. my riding; GENEV. troop (E. V. company) of horses; WILL.: the horse; NOYES: the horses; GINS.: my steed.]
2 [COV. There will I tarry for thee, my love, with mine host and with my chariots, which shall be no fewer than Pharaoh's]
3 The plur. רַעְיוֹת [rather רֵעָיוֹת—TR.] Judg. xi. 37 K'thibh. [E. VER. my love, Marg. in ver. 15: companion; WILL.: consort; FRY: partner.]
4 [GENEV. rows of stones; E. VER. rows of jewels; FRY: jewels; WITH. chains; THRUPP, GINSB.: circlet; WEISS.: reins.]
5 [GENEV. chains; E. VER. chains of gold; DOWAY: jewels; FRY: strings of beads; GOOD, BURROWES: strings of pearls: THRUPP, WITH., GINSB. necklace; WEISS.: chains, i. e., such as are attached to the pole or beam of the carriage, and which the horse wears on his neck.]
6 [In addition to the renderings given to this word in the preceding verse, WIC. here translates it: ribands; COV. neck-band; E. VER. borders; WITH. collars.]
7 [COV. buttons; E. VER. studs; WITH. stars.]
8 [WIC. The voice of the Church, of Christ. MAT. The voice of the Church.]
9 [So COV., ENG. VER.; GENEV. repast; DOWAY: repose, after the VULG. accubitu and the LXX ἀνακλίσει; GOOD: banquet; FRY: 'the king in his circuit' may either refer to his going round in some part of the procession, or to taking his stand in the midst of his retinue, or we may translate, 'until the king had taken his seat;' WILL., BURR. circle of friends; WEISS.: with his guest.]
10 [AINSW.: bag; TAYLOR: scent-bag; GOOD: casket; BURROWES: amulet.]
11 [COV. O my beloved. E. VER. my well-beloved, so constantly throughout the book in GENEV., except once in v. 9, "lover."]
12 [So COV., DOWAY, E. VER. Marg. The text of the Eng. Ver. has camphire.]
13 [WIC., MAT. The voice of Christ to the Church.]
14 [WIC., MAT. The voice of the Church to Christ.]
15 [COV., CRAN., BISH. Our bed is decked with flowers. DOW.: our little bed is flourishing.]
16 [COV. ceilings.]
17 [COV. balks; CRAN., BISH. cross-joints; E. V.: rafters, Marg.: galleries; GOOD, NOYES, FRY: roof; THRUPP: boardings; PARKHURST: ceiling; GESEN.: carved ceiling; FUERST: carved beams].
18 [E. VER. fir; AINS. brutin-tree.]
19 [WIC. The voice of Christ, of Him and of the Church; MAT. The voice of Christ.]

SHULAMITH.

3 [1]As an apple-tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons.
In his shade delighted I sit.
and his fruit is sweet to my palate.[2] 4 He has brought me into the wine-house, and his banner over me is love.
5 Stay me with pressed grapes,[3] refresh[4] me with apples, for I am sick of love.
6 His left hand is under my head,
and his right embraces me.
7 [5]I adjure you, ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the gazelles or by the hinds of the field,[6] that ye wake not, and that ye waken not love till it[7] please.

1 [WIC., MAT. The voice of the Church, of Christ.]
2 [COV., CRAN., BISH., DOW. throat; GENEV. mouth; E. V. taste].
3 [COV. grapes; CRAN., BISH. cups; GENEV., E. V. flagons].
4 [E. V. comfort; Marg. straw me; DOWAY, compass me about; AINSWORTH: strew me a bed; WILLIAMS: strew citrons around me; THRUPP: strew me with citron leaves].
5 [WIC., MAT. The voice of Christ, of the Church; WIC., DOW. I adjure you; COV., CRAN., GENEV., E. V.: I charge you.]
6 [THRUPP has: "fells," so as to rhyme with "gazelles," in fancied imitation of the original].
7 [COV., DOW., GENEV. she; E. V. correctly: he; GINSB., THRUPP: it].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. For the explanation of the title, see the Introduction, § 1 and § 3. To the view of those who assign vers. 2–4 entirely to the "daughters of Jerusalem," and suppose the words of Shulamith to begin with ver. 5 (HITZ., VAIH. and others, so too DEL.) stands opposed—1. That the wish "to be kissed with the kisses of his mouth" could scarcely have been expressed by the ladies of the court, or even by one of them, without filling Shulamith with indignation, of which, however, she shows nothing in what follows. 2. That the way in which the lover is extolled in vers. 2, 3, agrees perfectly with the fond encomiums and enthusiastic descriptions which Shulamith subsequently, i. 13, ff., and ii. 3, ff., bestows upon her lover. 3. That the interchange of the 1st sing. and the 1st plur. plainly points to a diversity of persons speaking, or to an alternation between a single speaker and a whole chorus. This latter circumstance likewise renders their assumption impossible, who (as EW., HENGSTENB., WEISSB. and most of the older interpreters) suppose that the whole of vers. 2–7 is spoken by Shulamith. Undoubtedly Shulamith and the ladies of the court here respond to each other in speech or song; yet not so that only the words "Draw me after thee . . . chambers" ver. 4 a belong to Shulamith, and all the rest to ver. 5 to the "women of the harem" (so RENAN), but simply that all that is in the singular is to be regarded as spoken by her alone, and all that is in the plural by her and the ladies together, so that in particular נרוצה (we will run) and נגילה וגו (we will be glad, etc.) are to be assigned to the ladies who confirm the words of Shulamith by joining in them themselves, while משכני אחריך (draw me after thee), הביאני המלך חדריו (the king has brought me into his chambers) and מישרים אהבוך (they rightly love thee) belong to Shulamith alone* (comp. DÖPKE in loc.) Then vers. 5–7 unquestionably belong to Shulamith alone; ver. 8 again to the ladies of the court, who reply with good-humored banter to the rustic simplicity and naiveté with which she has expressed ver. 7 her desire for her royal lover; vers. 9, ff. to Solomon, who now begins a loving conversation with his beloved, reaching to the close of the act.† During this familiar and cosy chat, which forms the second scene of the act, the chorus of ladies withdraws to the back-ground, but without leaving the stage entirely; for the concluding words of Shulamith ii. 7 are manifestly directed to them again, and that not as absent, but as present on the stage. The place of the action must be supposed to be some locality in the royal palace or residence in or near Jerusalem, some one of the "king's chambers" (חדרי המלך) ver. 4; whether precisely the "room devoted to wine parties," the "wine-room of the royal palace" (DEL.), cannot, as it seems, be certainly determined from the repeated reference to the excellence of wine (i. 2, 4), nor from the mention of the "house of wine" (בית היין ii. 4);

* [So PATRICK, GOOD, WILLIAMS, TAYLOR, FRY, the last two of whom divide ver. 5 in like manner, assigning the words "but comely," and "as the curtains of Solomon" to the daughters of Jerusalem, who compliment the bride on her beauty, while she in the remaining clauses speaks depreciatingly of herself; TAYLOR also apportions vers. 2, 3 between the bride and her attendant ladies, to whom FRY adds an imaginary messenger from the king. HARMER carries the sub-division of parts to an equal extent, claiming that not only the variation in number, but the change of person from third to second, and vice versa, indicates a diversity of speakers. The majority of English Commentators regard the bride as the sole speaker in ver. 2, as is done also in the headings to this chapter in the authorized version, and either find in the change of number evidence of the plurality involved in the unity of the speaker, (POOLE, THRUPP), or suppose that she in thought associates her companions with herself, we, i. e., "I and the virgins forementioned" (AINSWORTH), or that it is the language of modesty, though she means only herself (CLARKE)].

and even the "table" of the king spoken of i. 12 does not afford a perfectly sure support to this opinion. Only it appears to be certain from i. 16, 17 that we must imagine the scene to be open outwards, and to afford a prospect of fresh verdure and stately trees, such as cedars, cypresses, etc. It must therefore have been either a room in the king's palace upon Zion immediately adjacent to parks or gardens, or what in view of vi. 2, 3 (comp. iv. 16) is still more probable, an open summer-house (or pavilion) in the royal pleasure gardens of Wady Urtas, south of Jerusalem, near Bethlehem and Etam, in those magnificent grounds of David's splendor-loving son, which probably bordered upon Zion itself, and thence extended southward for several leagues, and of which there still remains at least a grand aqueduct, with three basins lying successively one above another, the so-called "pools of Solomon" (comp. K. FURRER, Wanderungen durch Palästina, Zürich, 1865, p. 178, etc.; C. HERUT, Palästina, p. 278, etc.; EWALD, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, III. 1, p. 64, etc.). That Shulamith had formed a personal acquaintance with the royal gardens in the neighborhood of Jerusalem directly after she had been brought from her home in the north of Israel to Solomon's court, is shown by her mention i. 14 of the "vineyards" or "vine-gardens of Engedi," near the Dead Sea, five or six German miles south-east of Jerusalem, from which however the conclusion must not be drawn that these pleasure-grounds of Engedi formed the scene of the action in the opening of the piece; see on that verse. WEISSBACH very properly locates the second scene of the Song from i. 9 onward in the gardens of Solomon near Jerusalem, but puts the action of vers. 1–8 somewhere on the way to this retreat, where Shulamith in her search for her lover chances to meet the women of Jerusalem. But in opposition to this may be urged—1. That there is nothing in the context to indicate a change in the locality between vers. 8 and 9. 2. The mention of the "king's chambers" in ver. 4 certainly implies the immediate vicinity of a royal palace, and probably the presence of the speaker in it. 3. It by no means follows from the metaphors borrowed from pastoral life, in which Shulamith speaks of her lover, ver. 7, that she thought he was really to be found in a "pasture ground," and engaged in feeding sheep. 4. With as little propriety can it be inferred from ver. 8 that Shulamith is represented as wandering about over the country and "accompanied by some little kids, searching for her lover in or near Jerusalem." *

2. FIRST SCENE. SHULAMITH. Vers. 2, 3.—Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth.—יִשָּׁקֵנִי—for which HITZIG needlessly reads יַשְׁקֵנִי, "let him give me to drink," etc. (comp. viii. 2)—is manifestly the utterance of a wish, "O that he would kiss me;" and its subject is not פִּיהוּ, "his mouth," which is too remote and manifestly stands in a genitive relation to נְשִׁיקוֹת "kisses;" nor מִנְּשִׁיקוֹת, equivalent to "one of his kisses" (EWALD, E. MEIER), for "a kiss kisses not but is kissed, and מִנְּשִׁיקוֹת includes an accusative" (HITZIG). The speaker's lover is rather thought of as the kissing subject, the same, whom in the vividness of her conception she immediately afterwards in b and in ver. 3 addresses in the second person, as though he who is so ardently longed for were already present.* The partitive מִן properly points to but one or a few kisses of her lover as the object of the beloved's wish; comp. Gen. xxviii. 11; Ex. xvi. 27; Ps. cxxxii. 11, and generally Ew., Lehr., § 217, b, 294, c. [GREEN's Heb. Gram., § 242, a]; J. H. MICHAELIS, in loc., "uno tantum vel altero de osculis."—"Kisses of his mouth"† are, moreover, in contrast with the idolatrous custom of hand-kisses, or kissing the hand to any one (Job xxxi. 27; comp. DEL., in loc.), tokens of honest love and affection between blood relations and friends (Gen. xxix. 11; xxxiii. 4; xli. 40; 1 Sam. x. 1; xx. 41; comp. Ps. ii. 12), and especially between lovers (Prov. vii. 13). It is not likely that the similarity of the words נשק kiss and שקה drink gave occasion to the comparison in b of caresses with wine (WEISSB.); this comparison is of itself a very natural one; comp. iv. 10; v. 1; viii. 2.—For better is thy love than wine.—דֹּדִים different from דַּדִּים "breasts, paps" (which the LXX here express by μαστοί, and the Vulg. by ubera [so WIC., COV., DOW.]), as well as from דּוֹדִים plur. of דּוֹד "beloved" (v. 1), denotes manifestations of love, caresses, φιλοφροσύναι (comp. iv. 10, 11; vii. 13; Prov. vii. 18; Ezek. xvi. 8; xxiii. 17), i. e., dalliance, exhibition of אַהֲבָה (vii. 7; viii. 6), fond endearments, (in bad taste VAIH., "Liebelei," flirtation.) In the comparison of such love with wine, the tertium comparationis is, as is shown by the parallels iv. 10, ff.; v. 1; vii. 9, ff. not the intoxicating power of wine, but primarily its sweetness ‡ only; comp. Acts ii. 13. The figure of intoxication indicates a higher grade of loving ecstasy than is here intended, comp. v. 1 b; Prov. v. 19; vii. 18, and in general WEISSB., in loc.

Ver. 3. In fragrance thine unguents are good.—לְרֵיחַ, "in respect to odor, as to fragrance," limits טוֹבִים, "good" (comp. Josh. xxii. 10; 1 Kings x. 23; Job xxxii. 4), and is emphatically placed at the beginning of the sentence. Commonly: "to the smell," or "for the smell," against which, however, lies the twofold objection: 1, that רֵיחַ denotes not the organ of smell, nor the act of smelling, but the odor which any thing exhales (odor, halitus), comp. i. 12; ii. 13; iv. 10; vii. 14; Hos. xiv. 7, etc.; 2, it is not לְרֵיחַ, but simply לְרֵיחַ. HITZIG's construction is quite too artificial; he connects 3 a with 2 b as its sublimitation, and translates "thy caresses are more precious than wine with the odor of thy precious ointment" (comp. the like mode of connection adopted in the Vulg., "ubera—fragantia unguentis optimis" [so COVERDALE, DOWAY]). So also is that of WEISSBACH, "thy ointments are good to serve as a perfume," where too much is evidently foisted into the simple לְרֵיחַ.*—An unguent which is poured forth is thy name. —The comparison of a good name with a fragrant unguent is also found, and on the basis of this passage in Hos. xiv. 7, 8; Eccles. vii. 1; Ecclus. xlix. 1. The ideas of smelling and being (or being named, bearing this or that name) are, as a general fact, closely related through the intermediate notion of breathing, respiring; comp. in German "Gerücht, ruchbar."† That the name of the lover is thus compared to a costly perfume diffusing a wide fragrance (comp. Mark xiv. 3; John xii. 3) plainly indicates that it is only the renowned King Solomon, an actual possessor of שֵׁם (name, i. e., fame, gloria—comp. Prov. xxii. 1; 1 Kings i. 47; Job xxx. 8), who can be thought of as this lover, and not a simple country swain (so WEISSB. properly against HERD., UMBR., etc.).—Therefore virgins love thee—i. e., not barely on account of this thy renown, but on account of all the excellencies celebrated in ver. 2, 3. Observe that עֲלָמוֹת is without the article. It is not the virgins universally, but simply virgins, such as Shulamith herself, or the "daughters of Jerusalem," the ladies of Solomon's court, by whom she sees herself surrounded, that she describes as lovers, as reverential admirers of the graceful, brilliant and lovely king. The guileless country lass, who has but recently been transferred into the circle of the countless virgins of the royal court (comp. vi. 8) here accounts to herself for the fact that many other virgins besides her are attached to the king with admiring devotion and love; comp., 4. c.

* [TAYLOR and WILLIAMS make the place to have been the bride's parlor in Solomon's palace, and the time the first day of the week preceding the marriage, i. 1–8 belonging to the morning, and 1. 9—ii. 7 to the evening of the day. BURROWES follows HARMER in the conjecture that "in the opening scene of this poem the king had probably gone forth, according to Oriental customs, to meet the bride, and was awaiting her with his princely retinue in an encampment where his rich pavilion, ver. 5, stood pre-eminent. The spouse on coming in sight of those kingly tents, gives utterance to the strong emotions of her heart]."

3. SHULAMITH AND THE DAUGHTERS OF JERUSALEM.

Ver. 4. Draw me after thee—as it is to be translated with the TARG., LUTH. and most of the recent expositors, connecting contrary to the common accentuation אַחֲרֶיךָ with מָשְׁכֵנִי, which requires it as its proper complement;‡ comp. Hos. xi. 4; Jer. xxxi. 3. By this drawing is meant, as appears from b, a drawing into the king's chambers, or at least into immediate proximity to him, not a conducting out of the palace into the country, as the advocates of the swain-hypothesis suppose, who see in these words an ardent call upon her distant lover.—We will run—i. e., not, "let us take flight, and hasten hence" [so GINSBURG: "Oh, let us flee together!"], as though here again there were a cry for help to her absent lover; but: "we will hasten to him," viz.: the gracious king; a lively exclamation uttered by Shulamith, and at the same time by the chorus of the daughters of Jerusalem catching the word from her.—The king has brought me into his chambers—a simple expression of the virgin's rapturous joy at the high honor and delight granted her by the king. As the words stand, they contain neither an indirect petition or complaint addressed to her distant lover (to which the following clauses of the verse would agree poorly enough), nor a wish directed to the king—as though the preterite הֱבִיאַנִי were to be taken in the sense of a precative or optative: "O that the king had brought me into his chambers" (so, e. g., HUG, WEISSB.), nor finally a condition dependent on the following נָגִילָה וגו (so HAHN, who supplies אִם, if, before הֱבִיאַנִי. "If the king brings me into his chambers, we will,"* etc. Furthermore, the "king's chambers" are by no means simply identical with the harem, the house of the women belonging to the royal palace (VAIH., REN., etc.); this would rather have been designated בֵּית הַנָּשִׁים, as in Esth. ii. 3, 9, ff., or simply called בַּיִת, house, as in 1 Kings vii. 8; ix. 24; Ps. lxviii. 13, etc. They are 2 Sam. iv. 7; xiii. 10, the king's own rooms in the palace, his sleeping apartments and sitting-rooms, penetralia regis, in distinction from those of his wives and the ladies of the court, which formed a particular division of the royal palace. Comp. 1 Kings vii. 8; Esth. ii. 12–14. Into these the king's own innermost apartments, Shulamith, as the favored object of his special love, had been repeatedly brought,—nay, she has in them her own proper abode and residence. She had therefore a perfect right to say: "The king has brought me into his chambers."†—We will exult and be glad in thee.—With these words, which recall Ps. xxxi. 7; cxviii. 24; Isa. xxv. 9; Joel ii. 21, 23, the ladies of the court again chime in with the language of Shulamith, in order to commend with her the happiness of belonging to the number of those who were loved by the king. בָּךְ, in thee,

* [WEISS.: Besides or in addition to the savor, etc. A sense which the prep. rarely has, and which is neither admissible here nor in Ex. xiv. 28; Lev. xi. 26; xvi. 16, to which he appeals. Incorrectly also the Eng. Ver.: Because of the savor, etc., which must then be connected with "therefore," etc., in the last clause, the second clause being parenthetic. "She has ointments preparatory to her exaltation; just as Esther was purified to go in to the king, Esth. ii. 12."—WITHINGTON].

† [Comp. Eng. 'To be in good or bad odor' for good or ill repute. This explanation of the relation of these ideas, which is developed at length by BAEHR, Symbolik d. Mos. Cultus, I., p. 459 ff., appears to be too subtle and remote. It is simpler to find the connection in the fact that the odor, like the name, indicates the character or quality of that from which it proceeds, or to which it belongs. It is an efflux from the object itself, the impression which it makes ad extra.—TR.]

‡ [There seems to be no sufficient reason for departing from the authority of the accents in the present instance. "We will run" requires "after thee" as its complement to indicate the direction of the running more than "draw me," where the direction is sufficiently implied. The violation of the accents is merely for the sake of evading the evidence afforded by the masc. pron. אַחֲרֶיךָ, that "after thee we will run" is still the language of the bride to Solomon—not of her virgin companions to the bride.—TR].

* [So too WEISS.: "When the king shall have brought me;" nor is it a prophetic preterite, the bride anticipating the time when she shall be brought (THRUPP). GINSBURG insists that the changes of person in this verse "clearly show that the king here referred to is a separate person from the beloved to whom the maiden is addressing herself." But he is compelled to acknowledge that just before in ver. 2 the third person and the second both refer to the same subject.—TR.]

belongs in equal measure to both verbs; comp. Isa. lxv. 19.—We will celebrate thy love more than wine.—Comp. ver. 2.—Rightly do they love thee.—The most obvious construction is to make the virgins again the subject, as in 3 c, and consequently to regard Shulamith as again the speaker. But the 3d plur. might also be taken impersonally (they, i. e., people generally love thee. Comp. יָבֻזוּ, they despise, viii. 1), and then the clause might be spoken by the entire chorus. מֵישָׁרִים, an adverbial accusative (as, e. g., פְּלָאִים, wonderfully, Lam. i. 9), means neither "without reserve" (Weissb.), nor "sincerely" (Gesen., Del.) [so Noyes; Eng. Ver. marg.: uprightly], but, as appears from the context and the parallels Ps. lviii. 2; lxxv. 3, "with good reason, rightly" (Ew., Hitzig, Vaih., etc.). This word is taken as the subject by the Sept. (εὐθύτης), Vulg. (recti diligunt te), Hengstenb. (rectitudes, i. e., abst. for concrete, the upright love thee), Umbr. (O favorite of all the virtues), etc. [so Eng. Ver., Thrupp, Wordsworth, Withington, Ginsburg], interpretations as ungrammatical as they are unsuited to the connection. The attempts at emendation proposed by Velth., Schelling, Augusti, are altogether unnecessary* (see Weissb., in loc.).

4. Shulamith. Vers. 5–7.

Ver. 5. Black I am, but comely.—The explanation of the fact that she was black (שְׁחוֹרָה) contained in the following verse shows that by this blackness can only be meant her being browned by the hot sun. Then too in Lam. iv. 8 the substantive שְׁחוֹר denotes only the livid or swarthy appearance of one who has suffered long from famine and wretchedness, and in this very passage the strong expression "black" is qualified by the diminutive "blackish" (שְׁחַרְחֹרֶת) in the verse immediately following.—Moreover, the whole statement before us was occasioned according to ver. 6, by the curious looks with which Shulamith had meanwhile been regarded by many of the daughters of Jerusalem and probably also by jeering remarks which they had made (comp. ver. 8). "But comely" [Taylor: attractive, engaging] (נָאוָה, lit., "agreeable"); the plain country maid hereby expresses with frank, straightforward simplicity her consciousness that nevertheless she was not altogether unworthy of the love of Solomon. There is no vain self-laudation in the words.—As the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon.—The first of these comparisons is designed to illustrate and set before the mind the idea of blackness, the second that of comeliness or elegance. "Kedar is a Bedawîn tribe near Palestine in the Arabian desert, Gen. xxv. 13; Isa. xxi. 17, which is here named in preference to all others, simply because the name קֵדָר seems originally to denote "blackness." Tents of poor Bedawîns, which are always exposed to the heat of the sun, must certainly appear blacker and less attractive than those of Solomon; and we need not therefore with other interpreters (see especially Hitz. and Weissb. who refer to the observations of modern travellers as Della Valle, Burckhardt, Harmer, Volney, etc.,) have recourse to the tents now commonly covered with black goat skins, as Shulamith only has in mind the blackness caused by the sun's rays. But Solomon's tents as a figure of the greatest elegance can only correspond to נָאוָה comely. We may without difficulty assume that the splendor-loving Solomon adopted the custom of oriental monarchs of living in tents once in the year in some charming district and in the utmost elegance and splendor (comp. the remarks above, ver. 1, respecting the pleasure grounds at Etham and Engedi.) It is, therefore, wholly unnecessary to understand by יְרִיעוֹת (with Del., Hitz., etc.,) tapestry,* which is neither permitted by usage nor by etymology, from יָרַע continuit, prop. velum, then tent-cloth." We shall have in the main to abide by this explanation of the passage given by Ewald, although we might assign to יְרִיעָה a different etymology, and derive it perhaps with Gesenius from יָרַע to tremble, flutter, or with Weissb. from יָרַע to be bad, i. e., of coarse, inferior workmanship. The two comparisons are in any case understood in quite too artificial a manner by the latter and by several others, who assume that both the tents of Kedar and the tent-coverings of Solomon set forth the peculiar combination of dark color with attractiveness in Shulamith's looks (for which an appeal is made to the testimony of travellers like D'Arvieux, Shaw, etc., according to whom a plain filled with the black tents of the Bedawîn presents a very pleasing and even beautiful spectacle.) In opposition to Böttcher's view, who though he assigns the words "Black am I, daughters of Jerusalem, as the tents of Kedar" to the "vinedresser," i. e., to Shulamith, refers the rest ("but comely" and "as the tent cloths of Solomon") to an "elderly princess," who looks with astonishment at the new comer, comp. Hitz. in loc., who properly rebukes the extravagance of the dissecting mania here exhibited.

Ver. 6. Look not at me because I am dusky, because the sun has scorched me. There is nothing in the context to indicate that the "look" is one of approval, in admiration of her beauty† (versus Böttcher, Hitz., etc.) Comp. above on ver. 5. My mother's sons were angry with me. Velth., Umbr., Ewald needlessly think of step-brothers or half-brothers; the passages adduced for this purpose Lev. xviii. 9; xx. 11: Deut. xxiii. 2, etc., are outweighed by many others as Gen. xxvii. 29; Ps. l. 20; lxix. 9; Deut. xiii. 7, where "mother's sons" corresponds in the parallelism to "brothers," and consequently is entirely synonymous with it. And this expression is the less surprising in Shulamith's mouth since like a true Hebrew daughter she is in the habit of denominating everything after her mother; comp. "my mother's house," iii. 4; viii. 2, and so too Ruth i. 8. We need not even assume that she would intimate a less favorable judgment of her brothers as more or less strange or distant in their bearing to her (ROCKE, HITZ.); and there is still less to justify the assumption that her brothers are by this expression emphatically designated as Shulamith's own brothers-german (vs. MAGNUS.) Yet it may with considerable probability be inferred from the expression before us, that Shulamith's father was no longer living at the time of this transaction, and her brothers had assumed the prerogatives of a father (comp. Gen. xxxiv. 5, ff.; 2 Sam. xiii. 20 ff.), but that her mother meanwhile was still living, which also seems to be favored by vi. 9, (viii. 2; iii. 4).—Made me keeper of the vineyards. This manifestly does not assign the reason of her brothers' anger, nor is this intimated in the following clause (vs. HENGSTENBERG and E. MEIER), it is rather passed over in silence as irrelevant. But this clause tells what her brothers did in consequence of their anger, and then the last clause states what further happened to her when degraded into a vineyard-keeper.—Mine own vineyard I have not kept.—The addition of שֶׁלִּי not only gives a special emphasis to the suffix in כַּרְמִי, but distinguishes the vineyard of Shulamith here named as quite distinct and of another sort from those of her brothers, which she had been obliged to keep (so viii. 12). It is a vineyard of a higher and more valuable kind, which alas! she had not carefully guarded. She herself with all that she has and is, must be intended by this vineyard of her own (comp. DEL. and WEISSB. in loc.), or it may be her beauty (EW., DÖPKE., MAGN., HEILIGST., HITZ., VAIH.),—at all events every thing that she had to surrender to Solomon and devote to him when she became his beloved and followed him. There is, in these words, no serious lament for her lost virtue (on the contrary see iv. 12-16) or for her forsaken lover (as BÖTTCHER, MEIER and tentatively also VAIH.); but they contain a lament half in jest or with mingled sadness and irony for her forfeited freedom, for which she constantly longs in spite of her attachment to her royal lover. In favor of this double meaning of "vineyard" may also be urged the etymology of כֶּרֶם, which agreeably to its derivation from the root כרם, signifies the "noblest," the "most valued possession," the "highest good," (comp. Hos. ii. 17; Isa. v. 7; Ps. xvi. 6, as well as EWALD and HITZIG in loc.).

Ver. 7. Tell me, thou whom my soul loveth, where feedest thou? To this dreamy exclamation of longing desire for her still absent lover, the close of the preceding verse forms a thoroughly appropriate introduction. Despoiled of her freedom and her beloved home she can only then feel happy amid the new and splendid objects which surround her, when he from love to whom she has forsaken all and to whom her whole heart belongs, is actually close beside her.

הַגִּידָה לִּי "inform me" not "cause me to be informed," for הגיד always denotes an immediate declaration or announcement. This expression would manifestly be less suited to an address to a far distant lover. The paraphrase of the idea דּוֹדִי by the fond circumlocution "whom my soul loveth" is found four times beside in the beautiful section iii. 1-4.—Shulamith represents her royal lover as "feeding" and then as "reclining" (or more exactly as "causing to recline," viz., his flock) simply because, as a plain country girl, she supposes that she can directly transfer to him the relations and occupations of country life, and hence assumes that the king may now be somewhere in the fields with his flocks, and have sought with them some shady resting-place as a protection from the hot noon-day sun. That Solomon was just then residing in his pleasure grounds near Jerusalem, that is to say in the country, might favor this artless conception of hers (comp. above on ver. 5.) But the assumption of WEISSBACH is needless, that Solomon was then actually engaged in the over-sight of his flocks (Eccles. ii. 7) like Absalom and his brothers who, according to 2 Sam. xiii. 23, ff., were accustomed to manage the sheep-shearing themselves, and to convert it into a merry-making. Nothing further is to be sought in the expressions before us, than a ready trope from pastoral life, and consequently one of those criteria which mark this poem as at least a partially idyllic or pastoral drama (comp. Introduc. § 1, Rem. 3). That Joseph's going to the pasturage of his brethren, Gen. xxxvii. 15, 16, was what specially suggested the present figurative representation is too far-fetched, though asserted by HENGSTENBERG, and connected with his allegorical mode of interpretation. Parallels for this "reclining at noon" may better be adduced from the figurative language of the prophets, as Isa. xlix. 10; Ps. xxiii. 2; Ezek. xxxiv. 13-15, or even from the ancient classics, as THEOCRITUS, Id., i. 14, 15; vi. 4; xxv. 216: HORACE, Od., III. xxix. 21; VIRG. Georg. III. 324 ff.*

[* The introduction of these figures from pastoral life has occasioned much needless perplexity among interpreters. CLARKE says: "How this would apply either to Solomon or to the princess of Egypt, is not easy to ascertain. Probably in the marriage festival there was something like our masks, in which persons of quality assumed rural characters and their employments." Some have thought this to be a separate and independent composition, unconnected with the preceding in which the king was spoken of. So besides the German fragmentists, FRY, who begins a new idyl with ver. 7 on account of "the entire change of imagery." Others maintain that the unity of the poem is unbroken, but insist that the king and the shepherd are distinct persons; so GINSBURG and the entire class of interpreters to which he belongs, and extremes meeting here as not infrequently elsewhere, allegorical interpreters have gone so far in the same direction as to allege that these diverse representations are incompatible in application to any literal subject, and that no consistent sense can be made of them but by referring them to Christ. This, however, is to prejudice the beauty and perfection of the allegory, and to damage the spiritual interpretation of the Song itself. The author of the Song is not writing directly of Christ and His church, but only under the figure of a bridegroom and his bride. His language must, therefore, in all cases have immediate application to the latter, and can set forth the former only as the character and relations in which the more immediate subjects are presented, serve as their faithful image. If this image is distorted, wanting in consistency, and its various parts mutually discordant, the effect of the whole is marred, its beauty and its truth are defaced. It is at least safe to say that this is an assumption, which should not be made without necessity.

The objection to the explanation of the bride's language given by ZÖCKLER is, that it seems to impute to her the silly conceit that her royal husband or betrothed was actually engaged in the occupation of a shepherd, and it makes the reply by the daughters of Jerusalem utterly unmeaning. WITHINGTON presents three alternatives, the last of which is the only simple and natural one. This speech "may be a natural mistake of the rural lass on her first union with the king, or it may be the king went into her country to rusticate, or it may be an allegorical expression by which she signifies that the king is a shepherd and his kingdom is a flock." WILLIAMS: "If he be like a good shepherd feeding his flock, ad-

For why should I be as one straying? etc. כְּעֹטְיָה is very variously explained. עָטָה "to cover" is commonly regarded as its theme, and it is accordingly translated "as one veiled" [so Eng. Ver. margin] i. e., as a harlot, Gen. xxxviii. 14, 15 (ROSENM., DEL.) [so THRUPP, BURROWES, NOYES]; or as. "one ashamed, veiled through shame" (UMBREIT, DÖPKE, HENGSTENBERG), or "as one unknown" (EWALD, HEILIGST., who compare the Arab. غطى obscurus fuit, occultavit) [WILLIAMS: as a stranger], or "as a mourner," (so some of the older commentators. as R. SOLOMON BEN MELEK, [AINSWORTH] after 2 Sam. xv. 30). [WEISS.: Muffled up as eastern women always were when exposed to the eyes of strangers, and as a shepherdess subject to insolent and injurious treatment from the shepherds, comp. Ex. ii. 16-19]. But the signification "cover" can no more be proved for עָטָה, than that of "pining away," which SCHULTENS (Op. Min. p. 240), ROCKE and others have sought to establish for the word. The Vulgate (ne vagari incipiam), SYMMACH. (ὡς ῥεμβομένη), SYR. and TARG., favor the meaning of wandering or straying, which is admirably suited to the context; [CLARKE: as a wanderer; one who not knowing where to find her companions wanders fruitlessly in seeking them.] In proof of it we shall not need BÖTTCHER's emendation כְּשֹׁטְיָה ("as a country-stroller"), but simply HITZIG's assumption that עֹטְיָה by a transposition of the ע is for טוֹעָה (= תּוֹעָה comp. Gen. xxxvii. 15); comp. ערף == רעף, עטף == Arab. ضعف etc., (a view as old as KLEUKER in loc., who with S. BOCHART actually proposes to read כְּטֹעִיָּה). The following expression "by the flocks of thy companions" is closely connected with this idea as the more exact limitation of the "straying." The "straying by the flocks of the king's companions," is nothing but a figure of speech for remaining among the throng of ladies in the royal court without the presence of the king himself; and that is just the veritably desolate and forlorn condition, from which Shulamith wishes to be released by the return of her lover. HITZIG arbitrarily explains the wandering of a wandering of her thoughts; and still more arbitrarily WEISSBACH seeks to give to עטה (with the following על for אל) the sense of "laying hands upon, purloining" ("that I, by the flocks of thy companions, be not regarded as one who will lay hands upon them," and for that reason is sneaking about them watching his opportunity.)

5. THE DAUGHTERS OF JERUSALEM.

Ver. 8. If thou know not, fairest among women, etc. This address (lit. "the fair (one) among the women," compare [GREEN's Hebrew Grammar, § 260, 2 (2)], EWALD, Lehrbuch, § 513, c) which is also used v. 9; vi. 1 by the "daughters of Jerusalem" in speaking to Shulamith, does not prove that the counsel here given "to follow the tracks of the flocks and pasture her kids beside the shepherds' huts" is a seriously meant exhortation to Shulamith to return to the condition of a shepherdess, or a friendly direction to her on her way to the royal flocks (WEISSB.). This language is evidently an "answer adapted to the narrow range of thought implied in Shulamith's question (which must necessarily appear foolish to the ladies of the court) and hence an unmeaning one, after which the fair shepherdess knew neither more nor less than she did before" (DEL.). It is therefore jeeringly intended, and if it did not exactly wound her deeply, it was certainly adapted to increase Shulamith's longing for her lover.—אִם־לֹא תֵדְעִי means neither "if thou do not know thyself" (SEPT., LUTH.), nor "if thou art deficient in understanding" (EWALD, HITZIG, etc., who appeal to Isa. i. 8; lvi. 10, passages not appropriate in this connection), but conformably to the similar passage, vi. 12, "if thou know not," viz.: where thy lover feeds, this object being readily supplied from the context.—צְאִי־לָךְ בְּעִקְבֵי הַצֹּאן "go out at the heels of the flock," i. e., go after it, follow its tracks, comp. Judg. iv. 10; v. 15. יָצָא therefore denotes here, as the Hiphil in Isa. xl. 26; 2 Sam. v. 2, going forth with the flock, not going out of the palace (VAIH., etc.).—"Thy kids," i. e., the kids which as such an enthusiastic admirer of country life, and a shepherd's occupation you must certainly have. That she actually had some with her (WEISSB.) by no means follows from this expression.

6. SECOND SCENE. SOLOMON, vers. 9-11. The king has now returned from the engagements, which had hitherto detained him from his women, and he begins a tender conversation with Shulamith, who is favored by him above all the rest; during which the others withdraw into the background. Comp. No. 1, above.

Ver. 9. To my horse in Pharaoh's chariots, literally: "to my mare;" for סוּסָה can scarcely stand collectively for סוּסִים "horses, a body of horse," (VULG. "equitatui; HENGSTB., WEISSB., etc.), and there is nothing to justify its being pointed לְסוּסַי (MAGN., HITZ.). The singular לְסֻסָתִי evidently refers to a favorite mare of the king (comp. Zech. x. 8), to a particularly fine, and splendidly caparisoned specimen of those τέσσαρες χιλιάδες θήλειαι ἵπποι, which according to 1 Kin. x. 26, Sept., Solomon had for his chariots; and more exactly to such a steed used on state occasions in Solomon's "Pharaoh-chariots," i. e., in those costly Pharaonic spans of horses, which according to 1 Kin. x. 28, 29, he had imported from Egypt. Solomon compares his beloved to this mare of his, harnessed and magnificently decorated before stately Pharaoh-chariots (not exactly before one of them, VATABL.), and that "on account of her youthful bloom and her unaffected demeanor, whose lovely charms are still further heightened by the simple ornaments worn upon her head and neck, vers. 10, 11" (DEL.). The point of the compa-ministering public benefits and dispensing judgment, why should not I enjoy the common benefit? If he be indulging in retirement, why may not I, who am admitted as his wife, enjoy his company and conversation?"] rison is not to be sought exclusively in the proud bearing of the horse, Job xxxix. 19, etc. (EWALD, VAIH., etc.), any more than in the glittering ornaments of his head and neck. In opposition to WEISSB., who thinks merely of the latter, and referring to HARTMANN'S Hebräerin am Putztische, (Hebrew woman at her Toilet), OLEARIUS "Persische Reisen" (Travels in Persia), etc. [see also HARMER'S Outlines, p. 205, and the illustrations of a bride's dress, in CALMET'S Dictionary] maintains that there was a marked similarity between the ornaments of pearls and chains worn by horses and by women in the East, and consequently by Shulamith in the present instance, it may be said that according to ver. 11 Solomon now first proposes to adorn his beloved with the proper gold and silver ornaments, and therefore she did not yet wear a burdensome head and neck ornament like a richly bridled mare.*—My dear; comp. i. 15; ii. 2; iv. 1, etc., where the same familiar form of address recurs.

Ver. 10. Comely are thy cheeks in chains. תּוֹר kindred with דּוֹר, טוּר etc., is equivalent to a circle, ring; in the plural consequently it denotes a chain composed of many rings, which goes around from the head under the chin, by which therefore the cheeks are encircled. Shulamith may not have brought this ornament together with the necklaces named in b (חֲרוּזִים kindred with חרש, חרט, little disks of metal or corals pierced and strung together) with her from the country, but may have received it as a present from Solomon since her coming to the royal court. Solomon, however, is not satisfied with this simple ornament, but promises her, ver. 11, much richer and more splendid jewels,—scarcely with the view of alluring her and binding her to his court (as even DEL. supposes) but simply to adorn yet more handsomely one who is so lovely, and to have his full pleasure in her as a magnificently attired princess.†

Ver. 11. Chains of gold—with points of silver. Needlessly, and quite too artificially, WEISSB. will have us understand by the נְקֻדּוֹת הַכָּסֶף something similar to the חֲרוּזִים little disks of silver pierced and strung together, which might be worn along with the gold chains. But עִם with by no means requires this explanation (comp. iv. 13): it rather leads to the far more natural assumption that the golden chains were dotted with silver "punctis argenteis distincti" (HITZIG).*

7. SHULAMITH vers. 12-14.

Ver. 12. Whilst the king (is) at his table, my spikenard yields its fragrance. If these words were to be translated: "whilst the king was at his table, my spikenard yielded its fragrance" (ROSENMUELLER, EWALD, HENGSTENB., VAIH., WEISSB., etc.), they could only mean: "as long as Solomon was absent, and did not burden me with his attentions, I was happy in the memory of my friend;" they would accordingly bear an emphatic testimony to the correctness of the herdsman or shepherd-hypothesis; for that the "fragrance of the spikenard" is to be taken literally and explained of the costly nard-oil on Shulamith's hair and garments, which had been as it were suppressed and far exceeded by the coming of her lover with his much more delightful fragrance (WEISSB.) is a very far-fetched explanation of these simple words.† They are rather to be taken as referring to the present, because the fact of there being no הָיָה was in the protasis makes against the preterite sense of נָתַן give‡ (comp. HITZ. in loc.) and because מֵסַב does not properly mean table, but rather company, festive assembly (comp. the adverbial use of the word in the singular, 1 Kin. vi. 29, and in the plural, 2 Kin. xxiii. 5; Job xxxvii. 12) and consequently points to the place where the king then was, to the women's apartment of his palace or park in contrast with his former stay in the fields, with the soldiers, on the chase, or elsewhere. The fragrance of Shulamith's nard is accordingly a figurative designation of the agreeable sensations or delightful feelings produced in her heart by the presence of her lover (comp. DEL.: "it only

*[CLARKE, BURROWES, and others adhere to the singular, "to my mare or steed." GOOD drops the pronoun: "one of the steeds," supposing the final yodh to be paragogic. So the common Eng. Ver., which takes the noun in a collective sense "company of horses," and is followed by the majority of English commentators, who find in this a proof of its allegorical meaning. The point of comparison according to the Westminster Assembly's Annotations is "comeliness," according to FRY "splendid decoration." POOLE, "An horse is a very stately and beautiful creature, and the Egyptian horses were preferred before others, and Pharaoh's own chariot horses were doubtless the best of their kind." THRUPP, WORDSWORTH, MOODY STUART suppose special allusion to the formidable character of Pharaoh's horses and chariots at the Red Sea, Ex. xiv. 9, 23. Several classic parallels have been adduced as THEOCRITUS, Idyl, xviii. 30; HORACE, Odes, iii. 11; SOPHOCLES, Electra, 25.—TR.]

†["The mention of the Egyptian steed in ver. 9 naturally suggested the reference here made to the beautiful head-dress of the spouse." BURROWES. "Whether she be still compared hereby to a company of horses, as in ver. 9, or to a woman is doubtful, for both similitudes do agree to the things here spoken of. The bridles of horses are often adorned with rows (of jewels) especially in kings' chariots. Also the next words 'thy neck with chains' may have like reference; for the kings of Midian when they went to war had chains about their camels' necks, Judg. viii. 26." AINSWORTH, so too Gill. Of the ornament spoken of in the first clause AINSWORTH further says, "The same word תּוֹר is also used for a 'turtle-dove,' which some therefore take here to be jewels or ornaments that had the figures of 'turtle-doves.'" It is so in fact translated both in the SEPT. and VULG., followed by WICLIFFE and DOWAY, "thy cheeks are beautiful as the turtle-doves." So too CRANMER and BISHOPS: "thy cheeks and thy neck are beautiful as the turtle's." It is needless to say after the explanation given in the commentary that this rendering confounds two entirely distinct words.—TR.]

[*BURROWES adopts the conjecture of HARMER in his Outlines, p. 206, that this is the description of a crown. So MOODY STUART: These silver studded circles of gold mean either the royal or the nuptial crown, or both in one. PATRICK, WILLIAMS, TAYLOR make this the language not of the bridegroom, but of the attendant virgins.]

[† Much less so, however, than that which would make the nard refer to a distant shepherd lover, of whose existence there is no evidence. WEISS, who adopts the above rendering gives a peculiar turn to the thought: "The bride is supposed to have been provided with a bundle of spikenard, with which she intended to regale her bridegroom, when he entered the banqueting house or saloon, where the guests and the bride await him, and he approached to salute her according to custom. But unfortunately the bridegroom being detained a long time in another chamber by one of the guests, the bride's precious bundle of spikenard yielded all its fragrance, and became useless. When he enters, however, ver. 13 it is more than supplied by the delicious odors of the bridegroom's ointments and spices, which fill all the room." This belongs to his historical interpretation of it as an emblem of Israel's losing his pious fervor and lapsing into gross sin, while the Lord was with Moses on Mount Sinai, and the subsequent forgiving love and condescending grace of God.—TR.]

[‡ There is no need of departing from the preterite form of the Hebrew verb to obtain the sense desired. It should be rendered "Whilst the king has been (as he still is) with his company, my nard has yielded its fragrance."—TR.]

emits again that fragrance, which it has absorbed from his glances"), a representation which by no means sounds too refined and courtly for this simple country girl, this child of nature, which therefore HITZIG very needlessly puts (as well as ver. 13) into the mouth of an enamored court lady as a voluptuous piece of flattery for Solomon.* For נֵרְדְּ, which must here denote not a stalk of the well-known Indian plant Valeriana Jatamansi (MAGN., BÖTTCHER), but the aromatic unguent prepared from it, and that as poured out, and consequently emitting its fragrance, comp. WINER, R. W. B. Art., "Narde." [SMITH'S Dictionary of the Bible, Art. Spikenard. KITTO'S Biblical Cyclopedia, Art. Nerd].

Ver. 13. A bundle of myrrh is my beloved to me. Evidently an advance upon the figure of the fragrant nard. The royal lover, who now rests upon Shulamith's bosom, is compared by her to a parcel of the costly myrrh-gum such as the ladies of the East are in the habit of carrying in their bosom. צְרוֹר הַמֹּר is not a bunch [so NOYES] or sprig of myrrh (EWALD, DELITZSCH, etc.) for there is no more evidence of any aromatic quality in the branches and leaves of the myrrh tree than there is of its occurrence in Palestine at all. We must therefore think of a bundle or box (not exactly a flask, as WEISSB. proposes, contrary to the meaning of צְרוֹר) of semi-fluid, or fluid myrrh gum, and must besides compare the use of this gum as an unguent, which is vouched for also in v. 5, 13; Esth. ii. 12; Ex. xxx. 28. On the carrying of boxes of ointment by Hebrew women, comp. also Isa. iii. 20; Job xlii. 14, and HARTMANN, die Hebräerin am Putztische II., p. 280 f.

Ver. 14. A cluster of cyprus is my beloved to me. כֹּפֶר SEPT.: (κύπρος here and iv. 13) is the cyprus flower or Alhenna, which is indigenous to India, and probably to Egypt (PLINY, H. N. xii. 24) and may have been transplanted by Solomon in his vineyards at Engedi (on which comp. No. 1 above) for the sake of the peculiarly strong odor of its yellowish-white, grape-like clusters of flowers. [See HARMER'S Outlines, pp. 218-221; SHAW'S Travels, pp. 113, '4: SONNINI'S Voyage, pp. 291-302]. Comp. in respect to the fondness of oriental women for this aromatic plant the testimony of a recent traveller in the "Ausland," 1851, No. 17. "The white Henna-blossoms, which grow in clusters and are called Tamar-henna, have a very penetrating odor, which seems disagreeable to the European who is unaccustomed to it; but the Orientals have an uncommon liking for this odor, and prefer it to any other. The native women commonly wear a bouquet of Tamar-henna on their bosom." The Hebrew name of this plant might with Simonis and others be derived from כפר to cover, with allusion to the custom which prevails among Oriental women of staining their finger nails yellow with Henna powder, but it is more natural to refer כֹּפֶר as well as κύπρος and the Lat. cuprum to the Sanskrit root cubh, "to shine, be yellow," whence cubhra. The exact parallelism between ver. 13 and 14, and in general the intimate connection of vers. 12-14, with their figures taken without exception from the region of vegetable aromas further yields decided testimony against HITZIG'S division of the passage as though vers. 12, 13, belonged to one of the women of the Harem, and only ver. 14 to Shulamith.

8. SOLOMON, SHULAMITH, vers. 15-17.

Ver. 15. Lo! thou art fair, my dear. The fond ardor, with which she has just spoken of her lover, has doubled the expressive beauty of her features. The perception of this leads Solomon full of rapture to praise her beauty.—Thine eyes are doves, i. e., not "thine eyes are doves' eyes," as though (like Ps. xlv. 7; 1 Kin. iv. 13, Ezra x. 13) the const. עֵינֵי were to be supplied; and the dove-like simplicity and fidelity of Shulamith's eyes were to be brought into the account as the point of comparison (VULG., SYR., IBN EZRA, VAT., GESEN., DEL., etc.), [Eng. Ver.]; but as is shown both by the context and the parallel passage, v. 12, "thine eyes resemble the lustrous and shimmering plumage of doves," wherein more particularly the white of the eyes is compared to that of the body, and the lustrous iris to the metallic lustre of the neck or wings of the dove (comp. Ps. lxviii. 14). Correctly therefore the Sept.: ὀφθαλμοί σου περιστεραί, and in the later times TARG., RASHI, HENGSTENBERG, HITZIG, etc.) [So HODGSON, WILLIAMS, FRY, THRUPP, etc.].

Ver. 16. Lo! thou art fair, my beloved, yea sweet. The exactly analogous form of expression, with which Shulamith here answers the flattering caresses of the king, makes it appear to the last degree forced to regard these words of hers as addressed to a distant lover. The climacteric אַף נָעִים "yes sweet, yes charming" is only the expression of her loving transport, and finds an illustrative commentary in the description ii. 3-5. [WILL., GINS. connect this adjective with what follows: "Lovely is our verdant couch"].—Yea, our couch is green, lit.: "greens, grows green" (רַעֲנָנָה) a reference to the stately, verdant, and refreshing natural surroundings, in the midst of which to their delight their loving intercourse now takes place, and perhaps more particularly to a shady grassplot under the trees of the park, upon which they were for the moment sitting or reclining; comp. § 1 above, and WEISSB. in loc. In opposition to HENGSTENB., who takes עֶרֶשׂ in the sense of

[* The meaning of this verse is differently given by COVERDALE: "When the king sitteth at the table, he shall smell my nardus." Her spikenard was not for her own gratification; she had perfumed herself with it for the king's sake alone, Esth. ii. 12, and it now gladly diffuses its fragrance in his presence to afford him pleasure. This FRY takes in its literal sense, supposing allusion to the throwing of flowers and perfumes as a token of high respect and complimentary congratulation. To this NOYES adds with an unnecessary degree of hesitation its emblematic sense: "It would seem to be too harsh a figure to suppose 'my spikenard' to mean 'my personal charms and graces' though such a supposition is favored by the next verse." AINSWORTH suggests the spiritual application: "In her and from her so adorned by her beloved, the odor of the Spirit of God in her, flowed forth and spread abroad to the delight of herself and others." THRUPP: "The symbolism of the Song of songs was outwardly acted, as is recorded in the gospels in the earthly life of the Lord Jesus, and is also permanently embodied in the worship of the Christian church. It was while He sat at table that the feet of our Saviour were on two separate occasions anointed, Luke vii. 36-50; John xii. 3 ff. And it is in the celebration of the Lord's Supper that the church still most solemnly presents her sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, which she beseeches God of His fatherly goodness to accept."—TR.]

"marriage-bed," and רַעֲנָן in a purely figurative sense of a gladsome and flourishing condition, may be urged that no mention can be made of a marriage-bed for Shulamith and Solomon before their nuptials, which are not described until iii. 6, etc.; likewise the contents of the following verses, especially ii. 1-3, which point to a continued stay of the lovers in the open air, under shady trees, and beside fragrant flowers.*

Ver. 17. The beams of our houses are cedars, our wainscoting cypress-trees. This can neither be the language of the "choir of women belonging to the harem" (Böttcher), whose entrance here would be to the last degree disturbing; nor even of Solomon (Hitzig, Weissb., Ren.) to whom the beauty of the place where they are, is a matter of perfect indifference, by reason of the rapture with which he regards his beloved; but only that of Shulamith, the innocent, light-hearted child of nature, who has just begun to express her pleasure in that lovely spot in the open air, to which her lover had conducted her, and whose words would sound quite unfinished and end abruptly if nothing further were added to the commendation of their verdant couch.—"Cedars" and "cypresses," also named together Isa. xiv. 8; Zech. xi. 2, as costly species of wood for building and stately, lofty trees, are here evidently meant in the literal sense, of living trees of this description, such as were to be found, along with other rare and noble plants, in the royal gardens of a king so skilled in nature and so fond of splendor. The figurative part of her language lies rather in the "beams" and the "wainscoting" (רָהִיטִים from רהט = Ar. خرط "to hew," hence = laquearia of the Vulg., wainscoting on walls and ceilings—not "pillars," Weissb., nor "rafters," Vatabl. and L. Cappell, [so E. V.], nor "floor," Hengstenberg, who prefers the K'ri רָהִיטִים). She, who had hitherto been without Solomon in the showy apartments of the palace, felicitates herself that she can now rest with him under the green trees of the garden, which seem to her to arch over them a far finer ceiling than those richly adorned halls. It is impossible to reconcile the mention of cedars, which only grew wild in Lebanon, not in central or northern Palestine, and consequently not in the vicinity of Shunem, with the shepherd hypothesis, whose advocates here find expressed Shulamith's longing for the verdure and shade of her home (e. g. Ewald, Vaih.).

9. Shulamith and Solomon, ii. 1–7.

Ver. 1. Shulamith: I am (only) a wild flower of Sharon, a lily of the valleys. The connection with the preceding is not to be denied altogether (with Delitzsch, who makes a new scene begin with this verse); still we must assume a pause of some length after i. 17, during which Shulamith who continues to tarry in the garden at the side of her lover, reflects upon her great good fortune in being selected to be the darling of the king, and by the comparison of the splendor which now surrounds her with the meadows and valleys of her home is disposed to humility and at the same time filled with longing for that simpler condition which she must forsake. She gives an artless as well as a delicate and striking expression to these feelings by calling herself "a wild-flower," a "lily of the valleys," which was not congruous to the many ornamental plants and artistic beauties of the royal court.*—Which flower of the plain of Sharon is intended by חֲבַצֶּלֶת הַשָּׁרוֹן, it is difficult to determine. Its identity with the "lily of the valley" (Sept., Vulg., and Targ. on Isa. xxxv. 1, the only other passage of the O. Test. in which חֲבַצֶּלֶת occurs), [Cran., lily; so Lee], is contradicted by its being mentioned in a parallel with it, a circumstance which requires us to think of some similar plant, but one which is specifically different from it. If חבצלת were really connected with חמץ, "to be red" (comp. חָמוּץ red, Isa. lxiii. 1), as Hitzig, Weissb., etc., assume, the simplest course would be with Aquila and R. Kimchi on Isa. xxxv. 1, to translate it "rose," [so Bish., Genev., E. Ver.], and then to compare the combination of rose and lily in Ecclus. xxxix. 13, 14 as probably drawn from this passage. But another etymology, which supposes the word to be in some manner compounded with בָּצָל onion (whether ח is prefixed, which serves to form quadrilaterals, or the adj. חָמֵץ "sour," lurks in its initial letters), points rather to some bulbous plant, perhaps the meadow-saffron, which the Old Syriac seems to have intended (comp. Mich., Ewald, Gesenius, etc.), [so Royle, Wordsworth, Noyes and Thrupp, who however translates it "daisy"], or the tulip (Velthusen, Magn., Vaih.), or the narcissus, for which last the Targ. already testifies with its נַרְקִים. As no one of these significations can be demonstrated with absolute certainty, it may be most advisable with the Sept. and Vulg. to abide by the indefinite "flower" [so Cov., Dow.], or

"wild-flower" [so WITHINGTON, GINSBURG]. Also in regard to the name Sharon שָׁרוֹן, it cannot be said decisively, whether it denotes the well-known plain along the coast between Cesarea and Joppa (Acts ix. 35), or the trans-jordanic plain named 1 Chron. v. 16, or finally a third meadow-land of Sharon between Tabor and the lake of Gennesaret mentioned by EUSEBIUS in the Onomast. This last might perhaps be most readily thought of on account of its vicinity to Shunem.*—Further חֲבַצֶּלֶת הַשָּׁרוֹן is, notwithstanding the article before שָׁרוֹן, to be translated "a wild-flower of Sharon" (comp. Gen. ix. 20; xxxv. 16; Jer. xiii. 4, etc.), and no conclusion can be drawn from this expression in favor of the allegorical explanation of Shulamith as the Church (against HENGSTENBERG).†—In both these comparisons, that with the flower of Sharon, and that with the lily (by which must be meant not the strongly scented lilium candidum, but rather as appears from i. 5, 6; v. 13 the Palestine red lily, lilium rubens of PLINY H. N. xxi. 5), the tertium comparat. is both the diminutive size of these plants compared with cedars, cypresses, etc., and also their beauty and elegance (Matt. vi. 28; Luke xii. 27), so that, although Shulamith refers to her lowliness and rural simplicity, she yet says nothing derogatory to herself,‡ and quite in analogy with i. 5 manifests a certain self-regard though genuinely modest, and pure as a child.

Ver. 2. As a lily among thorns, so is my dear among the daughters. That which had been to Shulamith an expression of her lowliness is seized upon by Solomon with courtly skill in order to bring out of it the more emphatic praise of her grace and beauty. More strongly almost than afterwards in vi. 8, 9 he puts all other women in the shade in comparison with his chosen one, likening them to thorns, the well-known figure of whatever is mean, troublesome and offensive (comp. Judg. ix. 14; 2 Kin. xiv. 9; Isa. vii. 23, ff.; xxxii. 13; lv. 13; Ezek. ii. 6; xxviii. 24; Hos. ix. 6; x. 8; Ps. lviii. 10; Prov. xxii. 5, etc). [NOYES: "It is not implied that the lily grows among thorns, but that his love surpassed other women as much as the lily the thorn." MOODY STUART quotes the following as illustrative from BONAR: "Close by these lilies there grew several of the thorny shrubs of the desert; but above them rose the lily spreading out its fresh green leaf as a contrast to the dingy verdure of these prickly shrubs."] With the translation "rose" [so COV., CRAN.] (which is moreover absolutely inadmissible, since the fem. שׁוֹשַׁנָּה must unquestionably have a sense like that of the masc. שׁוֹשָׁן or שׁוּשַׁן "lily") the strong contrast intended would almost entirely vanish, for the thorns serve only to adorn the rose. RENAN regards this verse and ver. 7 as spoken by the shepherd (!) entering here for the first time ("entrant brusquement en scène")! [GINSBURG imagines that i. 15 is also spoken by this imaginary shepherd.—TR.]

Ver. 3. As an apple-tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. Observe the exact parallelism of this sentence with ver. 2. Shulamith gives back the flattering commendation of her lover with a still closer adherence to his expressions than above in i. 16, and thus their conversation assumes the appearance of a "contest of mutually eulogistic love" (DELITZSCH). The reference of Shulamith's language to an absent lover, whom she praises in opposition to Solomon, who is indifferent or repulsive to her (EW., HITZ., VAIH., etc.), destroys the simple beauty of the dialogue. It is inadmissible to understand by the "apple tree (תַּפּוּחַ, Sept. μῆλον) some nobler fruit tree than the common Pyrus malus, as for instance, the quince (Pyrus cydonia), or the citron (malus medica) [so GOOD, WILLIAMS, TAYLOR, THRUPP, WITH.], or the orange (as is done by CELSIUS in his Hierobot. VELTHUS., ROSENM., VAN KOOTEN, etc.), on account of the mention made immediately afterwards (ver. 3*d*, and ver. 5) of the sweet fruit of the tree, because those acquainted with the East in former as well as in more recent times commend even the common apples of Syria and Palestine as an exceedingly generous fruit, of fine flavor and a pleasing fragrance (comp. HARMER, Observations, etc.,), and because the comparatively rare occurrence of תַּפּוּחַ in the Old Test., and its combination with the fig, pomegranate, palm, etc. (Joel i. 12; comp. Sol. Song vii. 9; viii. 5) point to its belonging to the nobler fruit-bearing plants of the flora of ancient Israel. [WORDSWORTH: It is a generic word (like malum in Latin), and may include the citron and lemon].—In his shadow delighted I sit, lit., "I delight and sit" (חִמַּדְתִּי וְיָשַׁבְתִּי) [GINS.: I delight to sit"], a construction like תַּרְבּוּ תְדַבְּרוּ 1 Sam. ii. 3, where the first verb seems to have only an adverbial force and the second expresses the principal idea,* comp. also below iv. 8; v. 6, and EWALD, Lehrbuch, § 285, b. [GREEN'S Heb. Gram. § 269]. Further it is no more necessary to take these verbs in a preterite sense here (EWALD, HITZ., etc.) than in i. 12, [strictly: I have been sitting and still sit.—TR.], so that this passage supplies no valid argument in favor of the shepherd hypothesis. In the figure of the sha-

* [HENGSTENBERG argues that "the valleys," which correspond in the parallelism with "Sharon," must also have the force of a proper name, and on the ground of 1 Chron. xii. 15, he decides that the valleys on either side of the Jordan are referred to. COV., GENEVA, DOWAY, FRY, THRUPP, WITH., GINS., follow the LXX in giving to Sharon an appellative sense: meadow, field or plain. The parallelism is, of course, not sufficient to justify either conclusion. GOOD finds an allusion here to her birth-place: "she was not of Egyptian origin, or royal descent, but a rose of the fields of Sharon—a native of Palestine." Of course the famous Sharon must be the one intended in such a passage as this.—TR.]

† [The article is always definite in Hebrew; and the only correct translation is therefore, "the flower of Sharon," where the article, however, is not to be taken in an eminent or exclusive sense, "the flower" par excellence (as WORDSWORTH: the flower of the whole earth; DOWAY: the flower of mankind) but has its generic sense, as is usual in comparisons. We may in conformity with our idiom substitute our indefinite for the Hebrew definite article in such cases, but this is by way of paraphrase, not exact translation. See GREEN'S Heb. Gram. § 245, 5, d.—TR.]

‡ If חבצלת really meant the "saffron," Colchicum autumnale, the comparison would contain what was damaging and degrading to Shulamith; but this is not admissible on account of the parallel, "lily of the valleys."

* [WORDSW. preserves the distinct verbal force of both words: "I long for his shadow and sit beneath it." COV.: "My delight is to sit under his shadow." ENG. VER.: "I sat down under his shadow with great delight." GENEVA: "Under his shadow I had delight and sat down."] dow the point of comparison is not the protection afforded (as e. g. Ps. xvii. 8; xci. 1; Isa. xxv. 4, etc.), but the refreshing and reviving influence of the nearness of her lover, just as the sweet fruit of the apple-tree serves to represent his agreeable caresses, so iv. 16; vii. 14 (comp. WEISSB. in loc.).

Ver. 4. He has brought me into his wine house. בֵּית הַיָּיִן must be the same essentially as בֵּית מִשְׁתֵּה הַיַּיִן, that is to say, a room or apartment for drinking wine, a banquet hall [ENG. VER.], not a "wine shop" (! BÖTTCH.), or a "wine cellar" (VULG.: "cella vinaria," LUTH., REN., etc.), [COV., CRAN., GENEV., DOWAY, WILLIAMS], or a "vine-arbor" (VAIH., etc.), or a "vineyard" (EWALD, HEILIGST., etc). But so surely as the expressions in the context, especially the "fruit" of the apple-tree in ver. 3*d*, and the "banner" in 4 b, are to be understood figuratively, with the same certainty must the literal interpretation of "leading into the wine room" be rejected, and the sense of this expression must be found rather in an increased participation in the sweet tokens of his love, an intoxication from caresses (already essentially correct RUPERTI, DÖDERL., GESENIUS, DÖPKE, WEISSB., etc.). [So GOOD, NOYES. GINS.: "bower of delight."] The words need therefore neither be taken as a wish (SEPT., εἰσαγάγετέ με εἰς οἶκον τοῦ οἴνου, VELTH., AMM., HUG, UMBREIT, etc.), [so GOOD, FRY], nor as a narrative of what her country lover had previously done with her (EWALD, VAIH., BÖTTCHER), nor as the enthusiastic exclamation of a lady of the harem, who was now embraced by Solomon instead of the coy Shulamith (!! HITZ.), etc. There is no alternative but to regard it as a figurative description of the love which she had experienced from Solomon, having its most exact analogon in i. 4 b, "the king has brought me into his chambers."—And his banner over me is love, i. e. not "he bears his love as an ensign before me who follow him" (GROTIUS, HITZIG, WEISSB., etc.), [so NOYES, THRUPP, etc.], but "love waves as a protecting and comforting banner over my head (Ps. xx. 6) when I am near him." So correctly DÖPKE, DEL., [WORDSW., BURROWES]; also EWALD, VAIH., etc., only the latter here again find described the love formerly enjoyed with her shepherd in the country. The banner (דֶּגֶל) is, wherever it occurs in the Old Test., a military figure (comp. besides Ps. xx. 6, also Num. i. 52; ii. 2, ff.). It must accordingly be explained here too in this sense, and not with BÖTTCHER of the sign before a wine shop (a tavern signboard!).*

Ver. 5. Stay me with grapes, refresh me with apples. The caresses of the king, who is clasping and embracing her (see ver. 6) produce an effect upon one so ardent in her love, which even if not "thoroughly agitating" (DELITZSCH), or "taking away her breath and almost stifling" (HOELEM), is yet powerfully exciting and as it were intoxicating, and directly wakens in her, probably for the first time since she came to the court, the consciousness that she is sick of love (comp. v. 8), and therefore needs to be strengthened by eating some refreshing fruit, or something of the sort. She directs her request for it, as is shown by the plurals סַמְּכוּנִי (literally, fulcite me, support me; comp. Gen. xxvii. 37; Ps. civ. 15), רַפְּדוּנִי, not to her lover himself (WEISSB.), but to the ladies of the court near her, to whom also the lively exclamation, ver. 7, is uttered. אֲשִׁישׁוֹת are neither aromatic unguents (SEPT., μύρα), nor flowers (VULG.: fulcite me floribus [so DOWAY]; so too SYMM., etc.), but agreeably to its probable derivation from אָשַׁשׁ "to found, to make firm" (see KNOBEL on Isa. xlvi. 8), pressed grapes, and so perhaps wine syrup, or better raisin cakes, grape cakes, which is favored both by the verb סָמַךְ and by the use of the word in Hos. iii. 1 (where the SEPT. translate, πέμματα), and in 2 Sam. vi. 19 (SEPT.: λάγανον ἀπὸ τηγάνου, pancakes).

Ver. 6. His left hand is under my head and his right embraces me. תְּחַבְּקֵנִי must not be taken in the optative here any more than in viii. 3, where the entire passage recurs, as though the sentence expressed a wish, "let his left hand be under my head and his right embrace me"* (EWALD, VAIH., WEISSB., etc., [so GINSB.].—This is contradicted by the whole situation as well in this passage as in viii. 3. On the score of language too it is simpler and more natural to understand it as an indicative.

Ver. 7. "I adjure you, ye daughters of Jerusalem," etc. In favor of Shulamith as the speaker in these closing words, it may be said: 1. That she is unmistakably the speaker of these words in iii. 5 and viii. 4, where as here they introduce a "pause in the action" of considerable length (EWALD). 2. That Shulamith already addressed the ladies of the court in ver. 5, who must accordingly be supposed to be near at hand as spectators of her joy. 3. That what she has said of her being "sick of love" prepared the way for this adjuration, and the latter is well-nigh unintelligible without reference to the former. We may from the outset, therefore, repel the attempts to treat the verse as the language of the queen mother, who enters here (! BÖTTCH.), or of the celestial Solomon (HENGSTENB., after many older expositors as STARKE, JO. LANGE, etc.), or of the poet (UMBR., HITZIG),† or, finally of the shepherd speaking to the chorus (! RENAN). "I adjure you," literally, I cause you (as much as in me is) to swear, I exact from you the sacred promise, I earnestly beg you.‡ Compare Gen. l. 5; Num. v. 19. By

* [The meaning of this clause is well expressed by COVERDALE: He loveth me specially well. DOWAY has: He hath ordered in me chastity. PARKHURST, without reason, supposes a reference to "a light or lamp, such as was carried before the new-married couple on the evening of their wedding, comp. Matt. xxv. 1-2."]

* [THRUPP insists on the future sense: The time shall come when that sickness of love, of which I now complain, shall be solaced and satisfied. TAYLOR makes vers. 4–6 the protasis of the sentence completed in ver. 7, "when he brings me, etc., when his left hand is, etc., I adjure you," etc.]

† [GILL, PATRICK, SCOTT and WILLIAMS make this the language of the bridegroom; the great body of English commentators refer it to the bride.—TR.]

‡ [WITHINGTON, in accordance with his supposition that the bride is the daughter of an Arab chief, whose adjuration is consequently by the roes and hinds of her native fields, remarks: "The semi-paganism of the oath is extremely natu-

the gazelles or by the hinds of the field. These animals are not named in the adjuration, because animals generally in contrast with men have "fixed annual rutting seasons" (Hitzig; likewise also Herder and others); nor because the ladies of Jerusalem were in the habit of keeping little pet gazelles (J. D. Mich.), nor on account of the resemblance of צְבָאוֹת and אַיְלוֹת הַשָּׂדֶה to the divine names יְהוָה צְבָאוֹת and אֱלֹהֵי הַשָּׁמַיִם (Weissb.); but doubtless on account of their pretty and graceful appearance (comp. Prov. v. 19), which makes these animals in particular fit symbols of tender and ideal love, and must make them especially dear to women in this point of view. Comp. particularly Döpke in loc., likewise Ewald: "In common life people swore by things, which belonged to the subject of conversation, or were especially dear to the speaker. As therefore the warrior swears by his sword, as Mohammed by the soul of which he is just about to speak (Kor. ch. xci. 7), so here Shulamith by the lovely gazelles since she is speaking of love."*—That ye wake not nor awaken love until it please. אִם־תָּעִירוּ, literally, "if ye wake," etc. (Ewald, § 325, b), [Green's Heb. Chrestomathy on Gen. xlii. 15]. The verb is here masc., corresponding to אֶתְכֶם in a, not because the daughters of Jerusalem were not real female personalities, as Hengstenberg [so too Wordsworth] insists, but because the primary gender is here used as common, as in ver. 5 above, and Judg. iv. 20; Isa. xxxii. 11; and frequently in the imperative. [Thrupp explains it by "the general indefiniteness of the character which the daughters of Jerusalem as members of the chorus here sustain." But see Green's Heb. Gram. § 275, 5.—Tr.]—הָאַהֲבָה is certainly not "the loved one," as though the warning here were not wantonly to wake Shulamith who had fallen asleep (Vulg. dilectam, Syr., Gesen., Ewald, Rosenm., Hengstenb., Renan and J. D. Michaelis who for the sake of this sense points הָאֲהֻבָה), but as this meaning would be in the highest degree unsuitable in the parallel passages iii. 5 and viii. 4, and as love as an ethical idea comes significantly forward elsewhere in this poem (vii. 7 and viii. 6 f.), it is manifestly love itself as a passion slumbering in the heart, which it would not do over-curiously to rouse or kindle to a flame. הֵעִיר הָאַהֲבָה cannot possibly mean "disturbing love" before it has attained full satisfaction of its desire for converse with the beloved object (Delitzsch, Weissb.), for it certainly expresses something analogous to הֵעִיר קִנְאָה "stir up jealousy" Isa. xlii. 13, and the Pi. עוֹרֵר, which is added to strengthen it, always and only has the sense of exciting or awakening e. g. strife, Prov. x. 12, strength or power, Ps. lxxx. 3, etc. Comp. also irritata voluptas, irritamenta amoris seu veneris in Latin poets (e. g. Ovid, de arte am. 2, 681; Metam. 9, 133; Juven. 11, 165); although here we are certainly not to think of any magic charms or philters to inflame love or lust, such as love apples, Gen. xxx. 14, etc., or quinces (Böttcher). The meaning of the admonition is rather simply this: "Plunge not rash and unbidden into the passion of love, that is to say not before love awakes of itself (till heart is joined to heart, till God Himself awakens in you an affection for the right man), be not forward to excite it in your hearts by frivolous coquetry or loose amorous arts." This caution may in some measure be regarded as the moral of the entire poem, inasmuch as it aims at the preservation of the chaste, truly moral, and consequently truly natural, character of love. It is, therefore, most suitably put into the mouth of Shulamith as the bearer or representative of such pure ethical love in contrast with the women of Solomon's court.* Comp. the like sentence viii. 7 b. ral." Moody Stuart: "This is no oath by the hinds of the fields, but a solemn charge with the strength of an oath." Williams infers, from a comparison of Gen. xxi. 30, that the "antelopes and hinds of the field" are referred to as witnesses of this solemn adjuration made in their presence.—Tr.]

[* Henry: "She gives them this charge by everything that is amiable in their eyes and dear to them." Fry: "The bride bids her attendants to be cautious not to disturb or call off the attention of her husband, whose society she has so coveted, as though they were approaching the gazelles or the deer of the plain." Taylor and Burrowes likewise find the point of the allusion in the timorousness of these animals. Gill and Scott combine both: "They are gentle and pleasant creatures, but exceedingly timorous." Words.: "The roes and hinds love their mates with tender affection and steadfast reliance and will not disturb them in their slumbers."]

* [This surely cannot be accepted as a satisfactory explanation of this difficult verse. The spontaneity of love, which no effort must be made to awaken, but which must be excited of itself, so far from being accounted a worthy lesson of divine revelation, is not even a doctrine of ethics, and would require considerable qualification before it could be admitted to be sound rational advice. If inspired instruction were to be given on the subject of conjugal love, and a whole book devoted to the treatment of it, we might reasonably expect that its constancy, purity and strength would be prominently dwelt upon, that due attention would be paid to the qualities on which it should be based, the affectionate offices by which it should be maintained, and the holy principles by which it should be regulated. But instead of all this the one thing insisted upon is that love must be spontaneous and unsolicited. What is this but to convert it into heedless, inconsiderate passion, the spring of ill-judged attachments, which prove as inharmonious in their issue as they were irrational in their origin? This is, besides, a very different thing from the theme of this book, as Zöckler himself conceives and represents it, which is the commendation of a pure and chaste conjugal affection as opposed to the dissoluteness and sensuality fostered by polygamy. It would also be a most extraordinary admonition for Shulamith to the daughters of Jerusalem, among whom, according to Zöckler's hypothesis were the wives of Solomon, married to him long before Shulamith had ever seen him.

Then besides the feebleness and inappropriateness of the sense obtained, it is doubtful whether the language of the verse can be made to yield it. The expressions thus explained are exceedingly vague. There is nothing to indicate in whom they are cautioned not to awaken love, whether in themselves or others; or in what way—may they not in any way seek to win another's affection or to excite their own, not even by exhibiting or discerning what is worthy of regard? And "till it (i. e., love) please," is to say the least an unexampled phrase. It is a very singular form of speech for any one to adopt: "do not excite a passion until that passion is willing to be excited."

Of the English commentators, who take "love" in its subjective sense of the feeling or emotion, Ginsburg under the bias of the unfounded shepherd-hypothesis translates: "neither to excite nor to incite my affection till it wishes another love," the words "another love" being introduced without any warrant from the text or context. Patrick paraphrases thus: "I conjure you not to discompose or give the least disturbance to that love; but let it enjoy its satisfaction to the height of its desires." So substantially Taylor and Thrupp. Weiss.: "If ye disturb this love until it shall become complete, i. e., until the marriage be consummated." But the verbs here employed mean to awaken or excite, not to disturb. It seems better, however, with the great body of interpreters to take "love" here as in vii. 6 in its objective sense of one who is beloved. Wordsworth compares "the words of S. Ignatius ad Rom. 7, ὁ ἐμὸς ἔρως ἐσταύρωται." The bride is locked in the fond embrace of him whom she loves. She would not have him aroused by the intrusion of

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The allegorical interpretation current in the Church regards all the particulars in the foregoing description of the loving intercourse between the bridegroom and the bride, as allusions veiled under mystical figures to the relation of Christ to the Church and further to the soul of the individual Christian. It sees in the opening words of Shulamith i. 2-4 a manifestation of the longing of the Church for union with her heavenly bridegroom, whilst the partial identification or combination of Shulamith with the other virgins was especially designed to indicate that the speaker was an ideal person as well as her lover, who is now addressed, now mentioned in the third person, and who forms the object of her longing desire. It further supposes in what Shulamith says vers. 5, 6 of her "blackness" and of her "not having kept her own vineyard," references to the sins of the church, as the causes of her temporary separation from God and her enslavement by the empire of this world; and accordingly finds, in ver. 7, a prayer to be informed respecting the way which leads back to communion with God and Christ, in ver. 8 a statement of this way vouchsafed to her by divine grace; vers. 9–17 depict the emulous contest of love, which proceeds between the Church penitently returned to her heavenly bridegroom and Christ, who graciously receives her; in which the cordial promptness and address, with which the bride immediately repeats in application to her bridegroom everything said in her praise, indicate the faith of the Church working by love and making constant progress in holiness. Then in ii. 1—7, it is alleged that "declarations of love advance to the enjoyment of love," and this latter is represented in ver. 6 as having already attained its acme under the emblem of an embrace, or of the nuptial couch. The epiphonema in ver. 7 brings the entire development to its conclusion, and shows by its twofold recurrence subsequently in iii. 5 and viii. 4, that the same subject is treated in successive cycles, and the process by which the loving union of Christ with the Church is effected is thus repeatedly symbolized under an allegorico-dramatic veil, varied with every iteration.—So among the more recent allegorizers, e. g., HENGSTENBERG (pp. 2 ff., 24 ff., 36 ff.), with whom the rest, as HAHN, HOELEMANN, etc., agree in everything essential, and particularly in the assertion of a cyclical mode of presentation, by which the dramatic unity of the whole is fundamentally destroyed, and several successive tableaux or portraitures of character are assumed, all relating to the same subject (or as HAHN expresses it, each "serves to supplement or further explain" its predecessors). Similarly the older allegorical interpreters, only they go into more detail in the mystical exposition of the individual figures, and see e. g. in the bundle of myrrh, i. 13, a reference to Christ's bitter passion, or to His perfect sacrifice for the sins of men (comp. STARKE in loc.), whereby consequently an allusion to His munus sacerdotale is added to that to the munus propheticum (i. 7, Christ as shepherd), and regium (i. 12, Christ as king); or expound the "golden bracelets" i. 11 of the growth of faith, the "silver points," in the same passage, of holiness of life; or hold the "wine cellar" ii. 4 to be an emblem of Christian churches and schools as "houses of wisdom," or see in it whether "the altar of the Church, where the body and blood of Christ are dispensed," or the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, with their various sorts or stages of divine revelation.*

2. In opposition to such aimless and unbridled others to the interrupting or abridging of her joy. POOLE, with an eye to its spiritual application: "Do not disturb nor offend him by your miscarriages." WORDS.: "The church conjures her children that they be not impatient but wait in faith and hope for God's own time, when it may please Him to arise and deliver her."—TR.]

* [GENEVA BIBLE, note on i. 2: "This is spoken in the person of the Church or of the faithful soul inflamed with the desire of Christ, whom she loveth." AINSW.: "The bride is the Church espoused to Christ." In i. 2 she "desireth to have Christ manifested in the flesh, and to have the loving and comfortable doctrines of His gospel applied unto her conscience." "By virgins (ver. 3) are meant all such (whether whole churches or particular persons) who with chaste and pure minds serve the Lord only." The daughters of Jerusalem are "the friends of Christ and His Church, the elect of God, though not yet perfectly instructed in the way of the Lord." The bride's blackness (ver. 5) is "the Church's afflictions and infirmities." Her mother's sons, "either false brethren, false prophets and deceivers, or inordinate lusts and sins which dwelt in her, and were conceived with her." "The vineyards opposed to her own vineyard seem to mean false churches, and in them the corruption of religion, whereunto her mother's sons sought to draw her; setting her to observe the ordinances and traditions of men, or otherwise to undergo their cruelty and wrath." In ver. 7 "the Church maketh request unto Christ for instruction in the administration of His kingdom here on earth." BURROWES regards this section as exhibiting, in successive steps, "the progress of the pious soul in the enjoyment of Christ's love and favor." 1. We enjoy the love of Jesus as manifested in private communion "in His chambers," i. 4. 2. In the way of duty and self-denial, i. 7–11. 3. In sitting with the King in the circle of His friends, and enjoying, as one of them, the delights of social communion with Him, i. 12–14. 4. In delightful repose with Him, amid enlarged prospects of spiritual beauty, i. 15–17. 5. In the protection and delights set forth in ii. 1–3. 6. In enjoying at last the pleasures mentioned in ii. 4–7, the greatest possible on earth."

WORDSW. finds expressed in i. 2 "the fervent yearnings of the Church for the advent of Christ." "The mother of the Bride (i. e., of the Church of Christ) is the Jewish nation, and her mother's children are Jews or Judaizers. It was the delinquency, ingratitude and cruelty of the "mother's children" which made the Christian Church become the "keeper of the vineyards."

According to THRUPP, "the Church of Israel, in i. 2, desires the very presence of her Saviour. She had been instructed and wooed through the messages of the prophets; she desired now that her promised Messiah should pour into her mouth words from His own mouth." The daughters of Jerusalem are "the members of the Church of Israel in their contemplative capacity; not necessarily different persons in their outer being from the virgins of ver. 3 (the upright), but yet representing them in a different point of view, with reference solely to their intelligent and emotional survey of what is passing, and without regard to their own spiritual state." The mother of the Bride is the nation of Israel. The mother's sons are "the several members of the nation, viewed only in their civil dealings, in their relation to the State, not in their relation to the Church." Their anger was the rebellion of the ten tribes. Her own vineyard was the religious culture of all Israel. Hindered in this by the political condition of the nation, she was driven to the establishment of colleges of holy disciples, the sons of the prophets at different centres, whose spheres of action are denoted by the vineyards, of which the anger of her brethren made her the keeper. WEISS refers this section to the time when Israel lay encamped at the foot of Sinai. The blackness of the bride (i. 5) was the sin of the golden calf, the sun that occasioned it was the bondage in Egypt. The petition (ver. 7) concerns the leading through the wilderness, and the house (ver. 17) is the tabernacle of Moses. MOODY STUART supposes the longing for Christ's appearance, and His actual birth among men, to be the subject of this section; his interpretation of which is specialized even to the extent of making the "green bed" of i. 16 refer to the fresh grass upon which the newly-born Saviour was laid in the manger for the cattle.

trifling, which lays no sure historical and exegetical foundation at the outset, and hence supposes that it can bring every possible mystery into the simple language of this poem, an unprejudiced historical exposition can see nothing in the section explained above, but the first act of a more prolonged lyrico-dramatic action, which by a gradual progress brings to its denouement the relation of two lovers, king Solomon and a fair Israelitish maiden, whose previous condition was that of a shepherdess or a vine-dresser. The development in this first section is not carried beyond the exhibiting a decided ethical contrast between the character of this maiden and that of the daughters of Jerusalem, i. e., the ladies of Solomon's court or harem, and the knitting in addition of a firm bond of loving heart-communion between her and the king, who for her sake already begins to contemn all the others, and even to find them unlovely (see ii. 2). It is not exactly the very first of the "mutual attachment" of the two lovers (Delitzsch), but it is the first consciousness in both of the incomparable strength and ardor of their reciprocal affection (see particularly ii. 5, 6), which is exhibited in this act, together with the first evident cropping out of an inner contrariety between this closely united pair and the other persons of the court; and this is brought by the principal person in the piece to the briefest and most emphatic expression possible, by the remark at the close in ii. 7, as a contrast of true and false love, or that which "awakes of itself," and that which is "excited" by amorous arts.*

3. Only thus much can be maintained as the well assured result of a sober, yet earnest-minded exposition of this first division, which keeps aloof from the profane assumptions and artificial combinations of modern shepherd-romances and amatory poems; and it is simply on this basis, therefore, that a practical application of the contents of this chapter and a half must proceed, if it is to be conducted upon sound and worthy principles. Its aim must consist essentially in pointing out and devoutly estimating the typical analogy which undeniably holds between what is here found and the dealings of the Redeemer with His Church. As Solomon raised his beloved from a low condition to his own glory, and that from mere love, and drawn by her beauty and charms, so the Lord has exalted man, sunk in misery and degradation, from no other motive than His love, His mere personal regard for our race, upon which His divine glory and blessedness were in no manner dependent; for "Nothing brought Him from above, Nothing but redeeming love."

As further Solomon's love to Shulamith appears in a gradual growth and a progression by successive steps, so too Christ lifts both His entire church and the individual souls that compose it, only step by step to the full and complete fellowship of His grace. To the call into His kingdom, which corresponds with the establishing of the relation of conjugal love in the royal gardens at Jerusalem represented in this act, succeed the higher stages of illumination, conversion, sanctification; but they do not follow immediately upon the heels of the former. As finally the lovely combination of child-like humility and of inward longing for her beloved, which Shulamith's character already exhibits in this first Song, forms her chief attraction which first makes her appear truly worthy of the love of her royal bridegroom, so in the soul of every Christian whom the Lord calls into His kingdom and will make partaker of His grace, the necessity of surrendering himself voluntarily to these gracious drawings with a hearty desire for a complete union with him becomes His highest duty; for "non visi volentes trahuntur a Deo" (Matt. xxiii. 37.)—Besides these analogies a sound and sober practical exposition of this section must also hold up the numerous points of difference between the historical type and the soteriological and Messianic antitype; and among these it must particularly point out the dissimilitude, nay the contrast between the earthly Solomon, and the divine-human Redeemer, as well as between the surroundings of both. For it is only in this way that the total of what is contained in this action can be duly developed and converted to practical profit in both a positive and a negative respect. Comp. Introduction, § 4, pp. 16 ff.

Whether the cyclic or the dramatic view of this book is to be preferred, may be left an open question at this stage of the exposition. If our author succeeds in showing a continuous progress in the action from first to last, the latter view is of course entitled to the preference. But if he fails in this, as in the translator's judgment he does, and as all have done who have made the same attempt before him, we seem to be shut up to the former; unless indeed even the cyclic view, at least as refined by some of its later advocates, is too artificial for the artless simplicity of this beautiful poem, in which the same theme recurs under varied aspects, but the law of succession is rather that of poetical association than logical exactness.

And the general character of this section creates an antecedent presumption favorable to this view. The intimacy here described is of the strictest and most loving nature, and seems to leave no room for any further advance. Instead of preparing the way for a married union, it rather implies that the marriage has already taken place. The "bed" i. 16 is in all probability not the nuptial couch. But Shulamith's presence in the king's apartments, the kisses and embraces, her open expression of her passionate fondness for the king would be unbecoming and inadmissible, especially amid the restraints of oriental society, prior to marriage.—Tr.]

SECOND SONG.

The first meeting of the lovers, related by Shulamith who has returned to her home.

CHAP. II. 8—III. 5.

FIRST (and only) SCENE:

SHULAMITH (alone).

8 Hark![1] my beloved; lo! here he comes, leaping[2] over the mountains,
bounding over the hills.
9 My beloved is like a gazelle or a young hart.[3]
Lo! here he stands behind our wall,[4] looking through[5] the windows, glancing through the lattices.[6]
10 Answered my beloved and said to me:
"Up,[7] my dear, my fair one and go forth!
11 For, lo! the winter is past,
the rain is over, is gone.
12 The flowers appear in the land,
the time for song[8] has arrived, and the voice of the turtle dove is heard in our land.
13 The fig-tree spices[9] its green figs and the vines are in bloom,[10] they yield fragrance, [11]up! my dear, my fair one and go forth!
14 My dove, in the clefts[12] of the rock, in the recess of the cliffs,[13]
let me see thy form,[14] let me hear thy voice, for thy voice is sweet and thy form is comely."—

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. It is the fixed opinion of almost all the more recent interpreters that this act contains two monologues or sonnets sung by Shulamith alone, and nothing more; and this is verified by all the particulars that it contains. The attempt of MAGNUS and DELITZSCH to strike out as spurious the formula of citation ii. 10 אָמַר דּוֹדִי וְאָמַר לִי and so to gain a dialogue form for the first and larger division (ii. 8-17) is wrecked not only by the evidence of genuineness afforded by all MSS. and ancient versions in favor of these words, but also by the closing verses of the section (vers. 15-17) which correctly interpreted represent her lover as present only to the imagination of Shulamith or to her memory, which vividly recalled him. Whether the two monologues are regarded as two distinct scenes, (as is commonly the case), or the scene is allowed to remain the same in both without change and only a pause of some length is interposed between them (EWALD, HITZ., HAHN,) is on the whole but an unessential difference. For a pause after ii. 17 is as undeniable and as universally admitted as is the peculiar character of the second sonnet iii. 1-5, which as the narration of a dream (with the apostrophizing of the daughters of Jerusalem therewith connected) is sharply and distinctly sundered from the preceding monologue, though this too is of a narrative character. As to what takes place between the two monologues or scenes, we may either suppose (with EWALD and others) a prolonged meditation and silence on the part of Shulamith, exhausted by the foregoing lively expression of her longing desire for her lover, or, as intimated in the above translation, that she sinks into a brief slumber, which brings before her in a dream the lover for whom she so ardently longs, and thus in the moment of her awaking recalls to her remembrance a like dream from the early days of her love, which she hereupon relates. No sufficient proof of this assumption can, it is true, be brought from the context. Yet it undoubtedly has more in its favor than, e. g., the hypothesis proposed by UMBREIT, ROCKE, VAIHINGER, RENAN and several of the older writers, that Shulamith utters the words ii. 8-17 in a dream, and then, after awaking, she relates (to the women of the harem around her) a dream which she had previously had, iii. 1 ff., in order to "prove her changeless love to the friend to whom her heart was given." The language in ii. 8-17 has, to be sure, a certain dream-like vagueness, rather than the character of a strictly historical narration. But this is sufficiently explained by the highly excited fancy of the singer, which brings up the past before her, as though she were experiencing it anew, and which in this lyrical recital, that is any thing but dry narration, here and there springs over what intervenes between the separate particulars of the action, especially in ver. 9 and between vers. 14 and 15.

2. It is, however, far more difficult to determine the scene or the situation, and the external surroundings of the speaker during this act, than to decide upon the form and style of the discourse. The adherents of the shepherd-hypothesis, who here conceive of Shulamith as continuing at Jerusalem in the royal harem, and expressing her longing for her distant lover, can urge, it is true, in favor of this the repetition of the address to the "daughters of Jerusalem" at the close of the section (iii. 5), but are not able to explain why the description in ii. 8-17 presupposes an undoubted country scene, with mountains, hills, vineyards, flowery fields, etc., or why it is a simple monologue of the beloved, and neither Solomon nor the daughters of Jerusalem utter a word. BÖTTCHER's view, therefore, seems to have something in its favor, that the locality of the action was a royal country house not far from Jerusalem, where Shulamith was detained a solitary prisoner. And the one circumstance at least that according to ii. 8 ff. the scene appears to be in the country, might be conveniently combined with the assumption that Shulamith here continues to stay in the royal pleasure-grounds south of the capital, and that Solomon has only left her again for a while for some unknown reasons. But Shulamith's place of abode plainly appears to be one further removed from Jerusalem, and in fact to be located in the region of her home. For 1) the mention of her mother's house, with its wall and its latticed window (iii. 4; ii. 9) makes it probable that she is there. 2) We are also led to the very same result by בְּאַרְצֵנוּ, "in our land," ii. 12, the mention of the "vineyards in bloom," ii. 13, 15, as well as the הָרֵי בָתֶר, ii. 17, whether this difficult expression be rendered "separating mountains," or "cleft mountains," or "spice mountains" (see in loc.). 3) Shulamith brought in solemn pomp to the wedding by her royal bridegroom, as described for the first time in the following act, iii. 6-11, presupposes that she had before been staying again in her parents' house; for it is from thence that according to the custom of the ancient Hebrews, the bride must always be brought (comp. 1 Mac. ix. 37, 39; Matth. xxv. 1, etc.). 4) That Shulamith came from northern Palestine to Jerusalem for her marriage with Solomon, is also rendered highly probable by the mention of Lebanon in what her newly espoused says to her, iv. 8; and further, the "coming up of the bride out of the wilderness," as described in iii. 6, in her entry into the capital, might point to a coming from the north, and not out of the wilderness of Judah, which lay south of Jerusalem (comp. in loc.). Accordingly the parental residence of the bride, or its vicinity is, with DÖPKE, HEILIGSTEDT and DELITZSCH, to be regarded as the scene of this passage—that is to say, Shunem or some neighboring locality in the tribe of Issachar north of Mount Gilboa, or on the south side of "Little Hermon." How Shulamith came thither again from the royal residence, whether peaceably dismissed to her home by agreement with her bridegroom, or conducted thither by himself in order to be subsequently brought with solemn pomp to the wedding, is not clearly explained in the piece. Only every thought must be excluded of a possible flight of the virgin from the royal harem to her home, for she exhibits her longing for her royal lover in undiminished strength, and this too not as though it had arisen from regret at her too hasty flight from him (comp. DELITZSCH, p. 99 f.).—As regards the time of the action, it appears to follow from the way that, ii. 11-13, the winter is described as past, and the fair spring-time as come, that an interval of some months had elapsed between the summer or autumn scene of the preceding act (i. 14, 16 f.; ii. 8 ff.) and the present, or more briefly, that "the entire rainy season lies between ii. 7 and ii. 8" (HITZ.). But as that charming description of opening spring belongs to a narration, and furthermore to a poetic and ideal narration of what Solomon said to his beloved on his first meeting with her, no conclusion can be drawn from it in respect to the time of this action. And neither the "winter" in ii. 11 nor the "nights" in iii. 1 (according to HITZIG the "long winter nights!") afford any support for that opinion, which would charge upon the poet too great a violation of the Aristotelian demand of the unity of time. On the contrary, there is nothing in the way of assuming with Ewald, Böttcher, Del. and most of the later interpreters, an interval of but a few days between Act 1 and 2 (which certainly need not be narrowed down to the space of a few hours, as, e. g., Vaihinger assumes), nor of regarding the entire action of the piece generally as taking place in the course of a single spring, and occupying, at the utmost, a few weeks.* Comp. on vii. 13.

3. Ch. ii., vers. 8, 9.

Ver. 8. Hark! my beloved.—Literally, "the voice [or sound] of my beloved,"—קוֹל דּוֹדִי, to which abrupt expression הָיָה it is or נִשְׁמַע is heard is to be supplied as in Isa. xl. 3, 6 (Matt. iii. 3); 2 Kings vi. 32. [It is rather an exclamation, to which no verb need be supplied, see Green's Heb. Chres. on Isa. xl. 3, 6]. And the following expression, "lo! there he comes," etc., shows that it is not the words of the bridegroom (Hengstenberg, after Michaelis and many of the older writers), but his coming itself or the sound of his coming and bounding over the mountains and the hills, in short his steps, which are indicated by קוֹל, comp. v. 2; Gen. iii. 8; 1 Kings xiv. 6. That Shulamith was shortly expecting her lover, may be probably inferred from this exclamation of hers which may be supposed to have been occasioned by some noise in which she thought she heard the steps of him for whom she longed. But that which further follows is not a description of his arrival, which now actually ensues (Magn., Del.), nor a mere airy fancy sketch or dreaming description of what her friend would say and do, if he were now actually to come (Umbr., Hitz., Vaih., etc.—see No. 1, above), but a vivid reminiscence of the way that he had actually come to her the first time and of the loving conversation which had then taken place between him and her by the wall of her parental home. It was the more natural for the bride to be thus vividly transported to the past, as she was hourly expecting her bridegroom back again at the very spot where he had then met with her for the first time.*—Leaping—bounding (מְקַפֵּץ—מְדַלֵּג). From this description of her lover's first coming to Shulamith, which is further illustrated by the following figures of the gazelle and the young hart, we may perhaps conclude that Solomon while hunting on Mount Gilboa, or in its vicinity, saw his beloved there for the first time, and formed a connection with her in the manner ideally described in what follows.

Ver. 9. My beloved is like a gazelle or a young hart. Hitzig calls in question the genuineness of these words, with no other grounds of suspicion than such as are purely subjective. They are designed more particularly to illustrate and justify in their application to her lover the somewhat bold and in themselves not very intelligible terms דלג "leaping," and קפץ "bounding." And this they manifestly do in so far as they call attention to the fact that he resembles those fair and noble animals not in his speed and agility merely, but generally in the charming grace and loftiness of his whole bearing. Comp. passages like 2 Sam. ii. 18; 1 Chron. xii. 8; Prov. vi. 5, where speed alone is the tert. comp. in this figure, with Ps. xviii. 34; Hab. iii. 19; Prov. v. 19, where the other qualities of these animals are also taken into the account.—Lo here he is, standing behind our wall. Judged by the analogy of other passages, in which it is found, the word here used does not mean the wall about the vineyard but the wall of the house, to which the mention of the window immediately after also points.† "Our wall," because Shulamith means the house belonging to her family, in or near which she now is again [or which she so well remembers—Tr.]; comp. viii. 8 "our sister," and "our vineyards" ver. 15.—Looking through the windows, glancing through the lattices—literally, "from the windows, from the lattices." It is a matter of indifference from which window he looks into the interior; it was only worth while to affirm in the general that he looked in from the region of the windows, that is from without. "Window" (חַלּוֹן), and "lattice" (חֲרַכָּא—according to the Targ. Josh. ii. 15, 18

The advocates of the idyllic hypothesis find here a distinct song, describing a visit paid by the lover to the fair object of his affections, without being at any pains to trace a connection between it and what had preceded. Taylor thinks that this belongs to the second day of the marriage feast; the bride from her window in the palace is attracted by the sound of a hunting party (ii. 15); the bridegroom, who is one of the party, looks up and addresses her. Withington supposes some time to have elapsed since the preceding scene. "The bride had gone up to Jerusalem, and after a stay there had gone back to the country, and was to remain there until the season came of her husband's rustication, which would naturally be in the spring." Burrowes: "The beloved had left the spouse; these words describe his return." Wordsworth connects this scene directly with the immediately preceding verse, the slumber of the bridegroom there described being equivalent to his absence or withdrawal: "The patience of the bride, after long waiting, is rewarded by the joyful sight of the bridegroom bounding over the hills." Ginsburg, with his peculiar modification of the shepherd-hypothesis, describes the situation as follows: "The Shulamite, to account for the severity of her brothers, mentioned in ii. 6, relates that her beloved shepherd came one charming morning in the spring to invite her to the fields (8–14); that her brothers, in order to prevent her from going, gave her employment in the gardens (15); that she consoled herself with the assurance that her beloved, though separated from her at that time, would come again in the evening (16, 17); that seeing he did not come, she, under difficult circumstances, ventured to seek him and found him (iii. 1–4)."—Tr.]

* [There is no propriety in sundering this from what follows. The succeeding verses evidently continue or explain this opening exclamation. If it belongs to the present, so does the entire description which it introduces. If the coming of the beloved here narrated is past, her exclamation on hearing the sound of his approach is past also.—Tr.]

† [Harmer supposes the reference is to a kiosk or eastern arbor, and quotes the Letters of Lady Montague, who speaks of them II. p. 74 as "enclosed with gilded lattices, round which vines, jessamines and honeysuckles make a sort of green wall."] equivalent to חַלּוֹן, of the same meaning also with אֶשְׁנָב Judg. v. 28; Prov. vii. 6, as well as with אֲרֻבָּה Hos. xiii. 3; Eccles. xii. 3) are plainly only different names for the same thing, of which however the latter expression is the more special or precise; for the lattice properly closed the aperture of the window and consequently was that through which he must have looked, comp. 2 Kin. xiii. 17.—מֵצִיץ literally, "blooming" (comp. Isa. xxvii. 6; Ps. cxxxii. 18 and especially Ps. lxxii. 16, where מֵצִיץ occurs of men blooming out of the earth) does not express a "transient appearing" or a "quick and stolen glance," but evidently describes the blooming and radiant appearance of her lover, who is also called "white and red," v. 10. "He blooms in through the window" (comp. MICHAELIS: "roseum suum vultum instar floris jucundissimi per retia cancellorum ostendens") is a pregnant expression, and reminds one of Gen. xlix. 22, where Joseph is described as a young fruit tree of luxuriant growth, whose "daughters" run over the wall.*

4. SOLOMON'S FIRST GREETING TO SHULAMITH, vers. 10–14.

Ver. 10. My beloved answered and said to me. In opposition to the doubts of MAGNUS and DELITZSCH regarding the genuineness of these words, see above No. 1. In respect to עָנָה in the opening of a discourse and consequently in the sense of "beginning to speak" (not "answering" HENGSTENBERG), comp. Deut. xxi. 7; xxvi. 5; 2 Chron. xxix. 31; Isa. xiv. 10; Job iii. 2, and ἀποκρίνεσθαι, which is frequently so used in the New Testament.† Arise, my dear, my fair one, and go forth, viz., out of the house—not "out of the city into the country," as the adherents of the shepherd-hypothesis suppose, who think the shepherd utters these words to Shulamith in her captive condition (similarly also WEISSBACH).‡

Ver. 11. For lo, the winter is past. סְתָו (for which the K'ri סְתָיו to fix the correct pronunciation instead of סְתוֹ as it might possibly be read) denotes, as also in Aram., the winter and that on the side of its cold, as the parallel expression גֶּשֶׁם (comp. Eccles. xii. 2; Job xxxvii. 6) denotes the same on the side of its moisture, that is to say, as the rainy season (עֵת גְּשָׁמִים time of rain, Ezr. x. 9, 13). The winter as the cold season of the year necessarily keeps people in the house; whence the allusion to its being past adds force to the solicitation to come out of the house.

Ver. 12. The flowers appear in the land, literally, "are seen (נִרְאוּ) in the land." On the rapidity with which the spring with its new verdure and its blooming attire usually follows the winter in the East, comp. HASSELQUIST, Reisen, p. 261.—The time of singing has arrived. עֵת הַזָּמִיר is not the "time for pruning vines," as the old translators explained it, after the analogy of Lev. xxv. 3 f.; Isa. v. 6; for in vers. 13 and 15 the vines are represented as already in blossom, the time for pruning them was therefore long since past; but it is the "time of singing, of merry songs." By this, however, we are not to understand the singing of birds (IBN EZRA, RASHI, E. MEIER), but conformably to Isa. xxv. 5 (זָמִיר), xxiv. 16; Job xxxv. 10; Ps. cxix. 54; 2 Sam. xxiii. 1, etc. (זְמִירוֹת), the glad songs of men, such as spring usually awakens, especially in the life of shepherds and country people (comp. Judg. xxi. 20 f.).—And the voice of the turtle is heard in our land, viz. in Palestine, the land of Solomon and and Shulamith. This בְּאַרְצֵנוּ does not by any means require us to regard Shulamith's country lover as the speaker, although it favors the assumption that the scene of the narrative lay in the country rather than in the city. The "turtle-dove" (תּוֹר) as a bird of passage (Jer. viii. 7) is a fit representative of spring, and it need not therefore symbolize the Holy Spirit (TARG.), nor the meek (HENGSTENB.), nor Israel in general (HAHN).

Ver. 13. The fig tree spices its fruit. As פַּגִּים means not the early figs but the late figs, i. e. the small fruit of the fig tree which continues to grow during the winter, and does not ripen until spring (Septuag. ὄλυνθοι, Vulgate, grossi), and as חָנַט signifies, Gen. l. 2, 26, "to spice, to perfume," this verb must here too have the sense of spicing and denote that "aromatic sweetness" which figs attain about the time of their ripening (comp. SCHUBERT, Reise III. p. 113). We must reject, therefore, both the "putting forth" of the ancient versions (Sept., Aq., Vulg., Syr.), and the signification of "reddening" or "browning," preferred by EWALD, HITZIG, RENAN, etc.; for the late figs are of a violet color even during the winter, when they are still unfit to eat (comp. MEIER and WEISSBACH in loc.).—And the vines are in blossom, literally, "are blossom." סְמָדַר a substantive, which occurs again ver. 15 and vii. 13, and whose etymology is very obscure (comp. VELTH., EWALD and HITZIG in loc.), can mean nothing but "blossom, vine blossom" either here or in the other two passages; and this is confirmed by the ancient versions (SEPT. κυπρίζειν, VULG. florere, SYMM. οἰνάνθη; also the SYR. on Isa. xvii. 11). It plainly makes no difference in the sense whether we translate "the vines are blossom (comp. e. g. Ex. ix. 31), give fragrance" (as is commonly done) or "the vines in blossom, i. e. since they are blossoming, yield their fragrance" (see e. g. WEISSB. comp. DELITZSCH). With regard to the fine delicious fragrance of the vine blossom comp. also Ecclus. xxiv. 23.

Ver. 14. My dove in the clefts of the rock.—No pause is observable between vers. 13 and 14 (HITZIG; comp. WEISSBACH). The tenderly caressing and alluring language continues without change. Solomon here entitles his beloved a "dove in the clefts of the rock," because, as appears from ver. 9, the bars of the latticed window still separate him from her. The allu-

* [WORDSW.: Literally, sprouting and blooming like a flowering shrub or creeper, whose blossoms peep and glance through the trellis or lattice work of a window, and giving brightness and loveliness to the apartment.]

† [WORDSW.: Here is an anticipation of the phrase so often applied in the gospels to Christ, who answered even the thoughts of His hearers.]

sion to her dove-like innocence and her lovely form is altogether subordinate, but must nevertheless not be left wholly out of the account as e. g. WEISSBACH insists; for "dove" is undoubtedly a tender pet-name, comp. vi. 9, and even i. 15. The allegorical interpretation, which sees in the dove "persecuted innocence" (HENGSTEN.), or even the righteous hiding himself in the gaping wounds of Christ (THEODORET, GREG. THE GREAT, J. GERH.) has clearly no exegetical justification.* In the secret of the cliffs, literally "in the hiding-place of the ladder of rock, of the steep rocky precipices," for this appears to be the meaning of the word here used. The expression evidently serves only to finish out the figure employed immediately before of the clefts of the rock concealing the dove. No conclusion can be based upon it respecting Shulamith's place of residence, as though it actually were a rock-bound castle (BÖTTCHER), or were in Solomon's lofty palace upon Zion (EWALD, HITZIG, VAIH., etc.)† The present description would rather appear to indicate (comp. above No. 2) that Shulamith's country home was surrounded by a mountainous and rocky region (DELITZSCH).—Let me see thy form, מַרְאֶה denotes in this poem not barely the face (this Solomon already saw through the lattice) but the entire form, comp. v. 15, also Gen. xii. 11;. xxix. 17; xxxix. 6.—Let me hear thy voice. Evidently an invitation to sing, with which Shulamith complies in ver. 15.—The following fortifying clause reminds of the similar one in ver. 9, a.

5. SHULAMITH'S ANSWER.

Ver. 15. That this verse is a little vintagers' song or at least the fragment of one, and that Shulamith sings it in answer to the request of her lover in vers. 10–14 is regarded as settled by most of the recent interpreters since HERDER. Only the allegorists, as HENGSTENBERG, HAHN, etc. see expressed in it Shulamith's fear of the foes of God's vineyard (i. e. heretics according to HENGSTENBERG, [so COV., PATR., POOLE and the generality of English Commentators], pagan Hamites according to HAHN.); and EWALD inappropriately puts the words into the mouth of the lover, who thus makes the connection again with what he had said in ver. 13. That we rather have here a separate ditty or fragment of a song, is shown not only by the plural form of address, but also by the accumulation of rhymes (שֻׁעָלִים, קְטַנִּים, מְחַבְּלִים, כְּרָמִים). And that this ditty is sung by the bride, not by the bridegroom, appears from its contents, which seem perfectly suitable for the keeper of a vineyard (see 1. 6), but not for her lover, be he king or shepherd.* It is, however, arbitrary and preposterous to assume with HITZIG and RENAN, that Shulamith sings this sonnet at one of the windows in the harem at Jerusalem in order to inform her lover from her old home, who was in the vicinity of the place of her abode, in nearly the same way that Richard Cœur de Lion betrayed the place of his captivity to Blondel, his faithful minstrel, by singing the refrain of a song familiar to them both. The whole situation too is not in the remotest manner adapted to such a romantic and sentimental meaning and design of the sonnet. Its context rather indicates plainly enough that it still belongs to Shulamith's narrative of her first meeting with her lover, and consequently is neither more nor less than her answer to his request to come out to him and to sing to him,—an answer, which whether actually given by her in just these words or not, at all events concealed a delicate allusion to her lover under a popular veil artlessly employed and half in jest, and intimated to him that she was not disinclined to let him take part henceforth in her care for the security of her vineyard. If she really sang these words, she did so while opening the doors of her house to admit her lover who stood without before the wall, or while she stepped out to him singing and smiling (comp. DELITZSCH in loc.)—Catch us foxes, little foxes, spoiling vineyards. The foxes deserve this name, not because they attack the ripe grapes themselves (THEOCR. Id. I. 46, ff; V. 112), but because by their passages and holes they undermine the walls of the vineyards and injure the roots of the vines; and they also gnaw the stems and young shoots.† It was important, therefore, in the spring when the vines were blossoming, to protect the vineyards from these uninvited guests; and the more so, since the spring is the very time of the coming forth of the young foxes from their kennels. The predicate קְטַנִּים little refers to young foxes (comp. Gen. ix. 24; xxvii. 15; 1 Kin. iii. 7), not to the diminutive size of the animals which nevertheless do so much damage [so HARMER, GOOD, WILLIAMS]; in that case the smaller variety of the jackal, which is known by the name of adive, would be specially intended by שֻׁעָלִים (HITZIG). But as the jackal is always called אִי or תַּן (Job xxx. 29. Mic. i. 8) in every other passage in which it is mentioned in the Old Testament, whilst שׁוּעָל

* HARMER says, on the authority of DR. SHAW: "Doves in those countries, it seems, take up their abodes in the hollow places of rocks and cliffs." WORDSW. suggests that the comparison is "to a dove fleeing to the clefts of the rock for refuge from the storm." GOOD quotes as parallel the following simile from HOMER's description of the wounded Diana, Il. xxi. 493.

> "As when the falcon wings her way above,
> To the cleft cavern speeds the affrighted dove, > Straight to her shelter thus the goddess flew."]

† [So HARMER, who supposes an allusion to "her apartments in a lofty palace of stone." GOOD: "The common version, 'secret places of the stairs' is erroneous. The mistake has obviously originated from a wish in the translators to give a literal interpretation to this highly figurative phraseology. Stairs may well enough apply to the royal fair-one as a bride, but not as a dove."]

* [GOOD, BURROWES, NOYES, ADELAIDE NEWTON, WITHINGTON, THRUPP, make this the language of the bride; PATRICK, POOLE, AINSWORTH, HENRY, SCOTT, TAYLOR, FRY, CLARKE, WORDSWORTH the language of the bridegroom. GINSBURG puts it in the mouth of Shulamith's brothers. WILLIAMS is led by the plural form of the pronouns both of the first and second persons to suppose that the chorus of virgins is here addressing the companions of the bridegroom. The ingenious suggestion that these words may be borrowed from a popular song, which here receive a new meaning from their connection, agrees well with this peculiarity in the form of expression and also with the intimation in the preceding verse.

WORDSW.: "He commands her to look well to her vineyard. He calls it our vineyard; it is his as well as hers." WITHINGTON, (after TAYLOR, who thinks this verse a summons to a chase) sees in it an allusion to the "sports and employments of the care-worn king" in his seasons of relaxation.]

† [PATRICK: ARISTOPHANES in his Equites, compares soldiers to foxes; spoiling whole countries as they do vineyards.]

is the constant designation of the fox proper, we are not justified here in departing from this usual meaning of the expression, comp. OEDMANN, Sammlungen II. 38; WINER, Real-Wörterbuch, Art. Füchse, also P. CASSEL on Judg. xv. 4. Moreover the expressions "little foxes" and "destroying vineyards" are simply related as in apposition to the principal object שְׁעָלִים; and both this and the words named as in apposition are without the article, because it is not the foxes universally, but just foxes, vineyard-destroying foxes that are to be taken. HITZIG seeks without necessity to base upon this absence of the article before שְׁעָלִים his translation "hold for us, ye foxes," etc., which he makes equivalent to "wait, ye foxes, I'll give it to you!"—For our vineyards are in bloom, literally "and our vineyards are in bloom;" comp. in respect to this specifying "and, and in fact," which here has a specially motive character, Eccles. i. 15; viii. 2; Judg. vi. 25; vii. 22; Mal. i. 11, and in general EWALD, § 340, b. By the expression סְמָדַר the singer takes up again what had been said by her lover, ver. 13, a, whether she altered her ditty in conformity with it, or that expression in the mouth of Solomon recalled to her mind this vernal song with the like-sounding refrain; this latter view is evidently the more natural.

6. CONCLUSION OF THE FIRST MONOLOGUE. Vers. 16, 17.

Ver. 16. My beloved is mine and I am his.—This declaration that she has become the property of her beloved and he hers, that they have mutually surrendered themselves to one another (comp. vi. 3; vii. 11), does not continue Shulamith's answer to the greeting of Solomon, ver. 10 b-14 (DELITZSCH, WEISSBACH, etc.), but after her account of her first meeting with him, which terminates with ver. 15, she takes up again the expression of her desire for her absent lover uttered in vers. 8, 9, by asserting in the first instance that though still absent, he was inseparably bound to her.*—Who feeds among the lilies.—Manifestly a figurative expression for "who, wherever he abides, spreads radiance, joy and loveliness about him," or "in whose footsteps roses and lilies ever bloom."† With reference to the figurative nature of this form of speech as a fixed and favorite poetical phrase, comp. its recurrence with two different applications, iv. 5 and vi. 3. Shulamith had already represented her royal lover as feeding his flock, i. 7.

Ver. 17. Against the day cools and the shadows flee.—Contrary to the division of the verses, as well as to the analogy of vi. 3, HERDER, AMM., KLEUKER, DÖPKE [so COVERDALE, DOWAY] connect these words with the participial clause at the close of the preceding verse. "Feeding among the lilies till the day grows cool" would yield a very tame and trivial thought, whilst, on the other hand, the following solicitation, "turn thee," etc., can scarcely dispense with some more particular statement of the time up to which or about which it should be complied with. Upon עַד שֶׁ (literally, "enduring till," "waiting till")="until," "whilst," by the time that, comp. the like forms of expression, Gen. xxiv. 33; xxvii. 45; Ex. xxii. 26; 1 Sam. i. 22; xiv. 19, etc.; also i. 12 above, where, it is true, the connection demands a somewhat different translation. Shulamith evidently begs her lover to return to her before the coming on of the shades of evening (before the day wholly cools, and the ever lengthening shadows melt quite away in the darkness—comp. Job xiv. 2). By evening, at the latest, and before night, he should come over the mountains to her swift as a gazelle, as at that first time when she had seen him bounding over the summits and the hills (ver. 8).*—Turn thee and be like, etc.—סֹב neither qualifies דְּמֵה adverbially, "resemble hereabouts a gazelle," etc. (WEISSBACH); nor is it an invitation to her friend already present to ramble with her upon the mountains in the neighborhood" (DELITZSCH); nor equivalent to "turn back again," as though it were intended to call back one who had shortly before been near her and who was going away (BÖTTCHER); but simply="turn thyself hither, direct thy steps hither" (comp. 1 Sam. xxii. 18; 2 Sam. xviii. 30). The Vulgate quite correctly, therefore, as regards the sense, revertere; so also the SYR., LUTH., etc.—The call upon him to "resemble the gazelle" is evidently connected with the description given of her lover in ver. 8. She wishes that her lover would now soon return, as she saw him then, swiftly and gracefully, like the sudden appearing of a noble deer on the mountain height.—On cleft mountains.—This translation of the difficult עַל־הָרֵי בָתֶר is especially favored by the ἐπὶ ὄρη κοιλωμάτων of the Sept. The usual signification of בֶּתֶר, "piece," "severed portion" (Gen. xv. 10; Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19, etc.) lies at the basis of it; and both the name of the place, בִּתְרוֹן, Bithron, the designation of a mountain ravine east of the Jordan, 2 Sam. ii. 29, and the Greek

* [WILLIAMS: "These verses stand perfectly distinct from the preceding." Others endeavor to establish a direct connection with the foregoing verses. Thus TAYLOR paraphrases: "I am all obedience to his requests; it shall be my happiness to accomplish his desires." And WORDSWORTH in its spiritual application: "The Church thankfully catches up the expression 'our vineyard;' and rejoices that not only have they one vineyard, but that He is hers and she is His."]

† [GOOD, with an entire misapprehension of the figure intended: "So sweet is his breath, that surely he feedeth among the lilies." GINSB.: "Who tends his flock in the meadows abounding with flowers." A figure for "the best pastures," according to WILLIAMS, "for in such lilies appear to have grown spontaneously;" or for "sweet and lovely pastures," according to POOLE, "where there is not only herbage to feed them, but lilies to delight them." FRY suggests as the connection between the clauses of the verse: "let him drive his flock to pasture in the flowery meads and I will accompany him." AINSWORTH, HENRY, WORDS. and others find in the lilies a figurative reference to the bride herself as the object of his fond attachment, and one who had been compared to a lily among thorns, ii. 2.]

* [GOOD: "Till the day breathe. The expression is truly elegant and poetical. At midnight all nature lies dead and lifeless. The shadows, however, at length fly; the morning breathes and nature revivifies. The intrinsic excellence of the metaphor has seldom been understood by our commentators, who have almost all of them referred it to the day breeze of the country, or at least to that peculiar current of air which is often found existing in most climates at the dawn." WILLIAMS: "Return, my beloved, and remain with me until the day breathe." NOYES: "This is understood by many of the morning. But the more recent commentators refer it to sunset or the evening." WORDSW.: "Before the first cool gales of the evening."]

ῥαγάς, "fissure, cleft," offer themselves at once as confirmatory analogies (comp. GESEN., Lex., also VAIH., RENAN and DELITZSCH in loc., "riven mountains"). Commonly, "on mountains of separation," i. e., on the mountains that separate us (comp. LUTHER, "auf den Scheidebergen;" MERC., EWALD, HITZIG, also the TARG., IBN EZRA and JARCHI) [so GINSBURG]. Peculiarly WEISSBACH "on the spice-mountains" (or "Bathrum heights," comp. Vulg., "super montes Bother," and THEODORET, who, as well as the Syr., translates similarly "ἐπὶ τὰ ὄρη θυμιαμάτων"); by this he supposes to be meant Shulamith's breasts perfumed with aromatic betel-leaves, i. e., with μαλοβάθρον, malabathrum=Syr., bathrum. But such an adducing of the הָרֵי בְשָׂמִים, mountains of spices mentioned in viii. 14, and that as identical in signification with the "mountain of myrrh" and "hill of frankincense" mentioned in iv. 6, i. e., with the fragrant breasts of his beloved (?), is in the present instance manifestly destructive of the sense and repugnant to the connection, and would besides yield an absolutely lascivious sense, which the expressions in question do not have in the two passages alleged.

7. SHULAMITH'S DREAM WITH THE EPIPHONEMA TO THE DAUGHTERS OF JERUSALEM, iii. 1-5.—Comp. above No. 1 and 2. This brief section, the narration of a dream which she had previously had, need not be referred to any other place than that of the preceding action; and no convincing ground can be gathered from the passage itself, either for the view of DELITZSCH that from the scene of the present action "Jerusalem was visible in the distance," nor for that of WEISSBACH, who imagines the scene to have been the very streets of Jerusalem. The adjuration of the daughters of Jerusalem at the close by no means implies their presence, but is sufficiently explained by the fact that the speaker, led by the same feelings as before (ii. 5 ff.) to a lively expression of the harm resulting from a self-induced exciting of the love sickness, clothes this expression in exactly the same words now as then, and conceives of the same witnesses present here as there. As besides the exclamation in question has also the character of a general moral sentiment (comp. above p. 55) intended for the spectators (real or imaginary) of the piece, the address to the women of Jerusalem conceived of as really distant from the speaker, would be the less surprising. And further, in the third passage, in which the exclamation occurs, viii. 4, the absence of the persons addressed is more probable than their presence (see in loc.).

Ver. 1. On my bed in the nights—i. e., agreeably to the context and the whole situation the same as "once in a dream," "lying upon my bed by night and dreaming."* בַּלֵּילוֹת belongs not to the verb "I sought," but to the preceding, "on my bed" (comp. the like connection in ii. 8); and this entire statement of the place and time "on my nightly couch," is plainly not designed to declare where she had vainly sought her lover, viz., in her bed (LUTHER, so too HENGSTENBERG, DELITZSCH, WEISSBACH), but how she had sought and not found him, viz., sleeping and dreaming at night. DELITZSCH, e. g., has sought to set aside what is morally offensive in the former explanation, by the assertion that "in a dream she might miss her lover even in the night, as though he were already her husband, who shared her bed." But thus it is clear that the offence is not removed; it is only increased. Far more attractively, and answering more exactly to the true construction, HITZIG: "It would be inadmissible to understand it: I thought to find him on my bed. Rather: I on my bed thought to find him. And not him too on the bed. She afterwards in ver. 2 resolves to seek him out of the house; so she seeks him now in the room, inside of the house, as far as her eye can penetrate, not barely within her bodily reach." Moreover, "in the nights" is certainly not equivalent to "in long and dreary nights" (HENGSTENB., and in general almost all the allegorists), nor "in the long winter nights" (HITZIG), nor "in several nights," as though the same dream had been repeated more than once (VAIHINGER) [WESTMINST. ANNOTAT.: "night after night;" so PATRICK]; but the plur. stands poetically for the sing. as more general and pictorial [GREEN'S Heb. Chrest. on Gen. xxxvii. 8]; comp. the "clefts of the rock" and "steeps," ii. 14 and בַּלֵּילוֹת again, ver. 8.—I sought him whom my soul loves. Comp. on i. 7.—I sought him and I found him not—viz., in my immediate surroundings, which my dream had in the first instance conjured up before me.

Ver. 2. I will rise now and go about in the city. With life-like vividness of description she relates what she said in her dream, as though she were saying it now for the first time. It is therefore unnecessary to supply אָמַרְתִּי I said (comp. vii. 9) before אָקוּמָה נָּא. The city with its markets and streets, where she proposes to wander about seeking her lover, is certainly Jerusalem, the royal city itself. She was there when she had the dream, and the action of the dream accordingly takes place there too.—In the markets and in the streets. The impropriety that there would be in an Israelitish maiden's actually roving about the streets in such a search (comp. Prov. vii. 11) disappears of course, if Shulamith was dreaming.

Ver. 3. Found me the watchmen who go about in the city. Such nightly guardians of the public safety might easily occur to the simple country maiden in her dream, because she had heard of their existence, or also because she had seen some of them at night from her residence. Comp. Ps. cxxvii. 1; Isa. lii. 8.—Whom my soul loves, have ye seen? The emotion of the questioner led to the prefixing of the object "whom my soul loves," as the word of greatest consequence to her.*

* [SO GOOD: "The word 'dream' does not occur in the original; but from the period of time, the place and position of the fair bride, there can be no doubt that she is here describing a dream." SCOTT: "The circumstances of this narration (and of one in some respects similar in the fifth chapter) are so improbable, if applied in their literal meaning to the newly-espoused queen of King Solomon, that to avoid the difficulty and to maintain the consistency of a dramatic poem on occasion of Solomon's marriage, it has been considered merely as a dream of the spouse. But the narrative gives not the least intimation of this." To which, however, NOYES replies: "The author would not be more likely to violate probability or propriety in an allegory than in the ordinary products of his imagination." WITH.: "She imagines herself in the city, and relates the incidents in vers. 3, 4. There is no need of supposing it a dream; it may be accounted for by the vivacity of eastern thought." TAYLOR thinks that what is subsequently said of the nocturnal search is not descriptive of what the bride actually did, but optative or hypothetical. FRY springs over the difficulty by means of his idyllic hypothesis, conceiving that this has no relation to the "nuptials of King Solomon," but that it relates "a circumstance in domestic life, among the lower or middling classes of society"].

Ver. 4. Scarcely had I passed from them; literally "what I had passed from them was a little, until I found," etc. (So correctly HITZIG, WEISSBACH).—When I found him whom my soul loves. Not because she thought herself at once transported from the city to her home (HITZIG), but simply in virtue of the easily shifting and quickly changing scenery of dreams, which bring now this person, now that immediately before us.—I grasped him and did not let him go. So also DELITZSCH, HITZIG, etc., after the SEPT. Cod. Vatic. (Καὶ οὐκ ἀφῆκα αὐτόν), the SYR. and RASHI. On the contrary, the VULG. "tenui eum, nec dimittam," and similarly VATABL., EWALD, HENGSTB., WEISSB., etc. [So COV., DOWAY: will not let him go]. But וְלֹא אַרְפֶּנּוּ by no means compels us to regard the action as future, "for the connection with Vav relat. [conversive] was simply severed by the negative and the second mode [future] was allowed to remain, comp. Job xxiii. 11; Jer. xliv. 42; 2 Sam. ii. 28, EWALD, Lehrb. § 383 c." (HITZIG). The immediate linking too of אֲחַזְתִּיו with מְצָאתִי, as well as the circumstance that the language does not pass into the form of an address to her lover ("I grasp thee and will not let thee go," etc.), shows plainly enough that Shulamith is continuing her account of what occurred in her dream.† Until I had brought him into my mother's house. The house or tent of the mother is, in the East, the proper residence of the female members of the family, comp. Gen. xxiv. 67; Ruth i. 8. In the mouth of Shulamith the expression properly vouches only for her childlike, artless and dutiful disposition (comp. Introduc. § 4, Rem. i.), not for the specially chaste and pure character of her love for Solomon (DELITZSCH), and still less certainly for any impure lusts that she might cherish (WEISSBACH). And there is no intimation of the latter in the words added, simply for the sake of the parallelism, "and into the chamber of her that conceived me."‡

Ver. 5. Comp. on ii. 7, as well as above, at the beginning of this No.

* [POOLE: She accosted the watchmen "without either fear or shame, as being transported and wholly swallowed up with love. She doth not name him [her husband] because she thought it needless, as supposing that a person of such transcendent excellency could not be unknown to men in that public capacity. Their answer is not mentioned, either because they gave her no answer, at least no satisfactory answer, or because by their silence she gathered that they were unable or unwilling to inform her; and being eager in the pursuit of her beloved, she would not lose time in impertinent discourses with them"].

† [The second verb is certainly future, though the act described may still be past, its time being reckoned not from the moment of speaking, but from the period denoted by the antecedent verb. The future, when thus employed, indicates that the act is subsequent to or conditioned by the preceding preterite. GREEN'S Heb. Gram., § 263, 5 a. The shade of thought so suggested is well expressed in the ENGLISH VERSION: "I held him, and would not let him go."—TR.]

‡ [HODGSON: "This passage seems to prove that the person here married was not Pharaoh's daughter; for if she had been Pharaoh's daughter, her mother's house would have been in Egypt, whereas this scene lies in Jerusalem; for in the next line she addresses the daughters of Jerusalem, and desires them not to disturb her sleeping husband"].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. According to the allegorical exegesis of ancient as of modern times, the essential thing described in this song is the "painful search," which must precede the finding of the heavenly bridegroom on the part of his church, as well as on the part of the soul of the individual believer. And they commonly find in ii. 8–17 the development of the thought "that sore trials will precede the appearing of the heavenly Solomon," while iii. 1–5 sets forth the truth that the salvation of the Messiah cannot be brought to pass by one's own strength, nor by earthly and human means, but that whoever seeks to draw the Saviour down from heaven in this way, not only will not find Him, but will be found and punished by His watchmen. In short, the native inability of man to achieve his salvation of himself, and the necessity of a saving interposition of divine grace from above to deliver us from our distress and disquiet, is thought to form the principal object represented in this section (comp. HENGSTENBERG, pp. 49–66; HAHN, p. 46; STARKE, Synops., p. 2404, 2426 f., and the older interpreters there adduced).*

* [DOWAY, note on ii. 8: "The voice of my beloved: that is, the preaching of the gospel surmounting difficulties." On ii. 15: "Christ commands His pastors to catch false teachers, by holding forth their fallacy and erroneous doctrine, which, like foxes, would bite and destroy the vines." On iii. 1: "The Gentiles as in the dark, and seeking in heathen delusion what they could not find, the true God, until Christ revealed His doctrine to them by His watchmen (ver. 3), that is, by the apostles and teachers, by whom they were converted to the true faith. And holding that faith firmly, the spouse, the Catholic church declares (ver. 4), that 'She will not let Him go, till she bring Him into her mother's house,' that is, till at last the Jews shall also find him."

GENEVA, note on ii. 8: "This is spoken of Christ, who took upon Him our nature to come to help His Church." On ver. 15: "Suppress the heretics while they are young, that is, when they begin to destroy the vine of the Lord." On iii. 1: "The Church in troubles seeketh to Christ, but is not incontinently heard."

WORDSW., on ii. 8: "After absence the bridegroom returns. The Church is comforted after her trials. Thus it was at the first advent, when Christ came to the Church after long expectation; and thus will it be when He will come at the great day." On ver. 15: "The duty of the Church to maintain the faith and to repress heresy. The poisonous error is to be nipped in the bud." On iii. 1: "The Bride seeming to herself to be left a widow, seeks her Beloved in a time of darkness and sorrow, and she finds Him not; she therefore goes forth in quest of Him. This has been verified at divers times in the history of the Church, specially was it true at the time of our Lord's passion. So will it be in the dark night of Anti-Christianism, on the eve of the second advent of Christ." On ver. 4: "The Church passes from the watchmen, because they would not help her to find Christ. This is a very important text, in reference to the question of schism. If the watchmen of a church do not direct the eyes of the faithful to Christ, the faithful must pass from them—whatever the consequences may be—the faithful must seek for Christ until they find Him."

According to THRUPP, this section describes the Church as patiently awaiting the advent through a long season of dark storms, of baneful attacks and of anxious searchings. MOODY STUART makes its subject to be "the sleeping Bride awakened;" first, "the call to meet the bridegroom" through "the preaching of John the Baptist," ii. 8–15; secondly, "the response to the call," ii. 16—iii. 5, when "John's disciples seek Christ." WEISS. finds the winter (ii. 11) in the forty years' wandering of the children of Israel in the desert: the foxes (ver. 15) are the idolatrous Canaanites whom they were bidden to destroy; the night (iii. 1) is the period of the Judges, marked by few revelations; the watchmen (ver. 3)

2. A considerate historical exposition also recognizes the loving desire and search of a bride for her bridegroom, as the main object described in this act. But it avoids seeing anything morally reprehensible in this longing desire of the maiden separated from her lover. It rather, in accordance with the unmistakable design of the poet, regards this very fidelity with which the bride clings to the friend of her choice even during a long separation, as one of the loveliest traits in her character. Neither by day nor by night, neither waking nor dreaming can she turn her thoughts away from the object of her affection.* Every noise seems to her to betoken his coming; in the sound of every voice she fancies that she hears him for whom she ardently longs, and whom she is expecting back with painful eagerness. With perfect distinctness and the utmost vividness the glad event of her first meeting with her lover still stands before her eyes. She recalls most clearly all the particulars of an occurrence, the most enrapturing she has ever known. Of the sweet and flattering words, which her royal bridegroom then addressed to her, not one has escaped her. She can still relate most exactly both the words perfumed with the sweetest fragrance of spring, with which her nature-loving, nature-appreciating friend then enticed her out and irresistibly drew her to himself, and the verse of the rustic song, by singing which she playfully gave him to understand that she returned his affection, that her vineyard should henceforth bloom for him, and that he should help her to guard and keep it. And that other painful and yet blessed moment of her former intercourse with her royal lover stands no less clearly before her eyes, which taught her, in a dream it is true, and yet with heart-stirring power, that she could no longer live without him, that she could not be for an instant separated from him without experiencing a painful longing for him, and that this loving desire and languishing for him would never henceforth cease until she had him and held him, until she was wholly and forever united with him. This yearning of her heart, so affectingly described by her, attains its acme once in the conclusion which she reaches in her account of her first interview with her lover (ii. 16): "My beloved is mine, and I am his, who feeds among the lilies;" and again, in the closing words of her recital of her dream (iii. 4): "I grasped him and did not let him go until I had brought him into my mother's house and into the chamber of her that conceived me."

3. In this double confession of a love faithful unto death, which cannot rest until its longing for a complete and permanent union with the beloved object is appeased, is evidently disclosed the fundamental thought of this section of the piece. For the epiphonema to the daughters of Jerusalem (iii. 5) which is here again added as the concluding words of the entire act, has a subordinate significance as a refrain repeated verbatim from ii. 7 and only appears as a practical inference, with the limitations due to the time and the place from the real summit of contemplation before ascended, ver. 4. Applied to the entire body of the kingdom of God and especially to the relation of the New Testament child of God to his Lord and Saviour, this practical inference must necessarily assume a somewhat different as well as deeper and broader form and meaning than in its relation to the "daughters of Jerusalem." In the case of Christians the meaning of the loving desire and waiting of a bride, who can no longer live without her bridegroom, who feels herself to be wholly his as he is wholly hers, and who will then first be satisfied when his house has become hers, and her house his,—the meaning for Christians of such a bride-like longing is just a powerful admonition to strive after a complete and permanent union with the Saviour as the true bridegroom of souls, and not to let Him go until He has made His entry into both house and heart with all the fulness of His heavenly gifts. The Christian should not grow weary of longing for and imploring the advent of his Lord into his heart, until, become entirely His and His alone, he can say, "My beloved is mine and I am his," until he feels that his soul is espoused to Him as the bride to her bridegroom (John xiv. 23; xvii. 21 ff.). And as the Church, in so far as she is the true and proper bride of the Lord, cannot cease to long for His glorious appearing, by which she shall become one flesh with Him for ever and ever (Eph. v. 32; 2 Cor. xi. 2; Rev. xxii. 17), so also the soul of each individual Christian should be ever saying to the heavenly bridegroom, with the fervent petition of earnest love, "Come, Lord Jesus; come quickly." The typical exegete, whose task coincides in essential particulars with that of the practical expositor, must keep himself in the main to these principal and fundamental thoughts as suggested by the contents of this section devotionally considered, and must most carefully avoid, as destitute of the requisite exegetical basis, the too special exposition of details, such as e. g. the reference of the "clefts of the rock," ii. 14, to the wounds of Christ; of the "little foxes" to heretics and other seducers; of the "nights" to dark seasons of affliction; of the "watchmen" to angels, etc. Models of a truly edifying typical treatment of the Song of Solomon as a whole and of the present section in particular may be found in those precious pearls belonging to the hymnology of our Evangelical Church, which have drawn their loveliest figures and their most characteristic and leading motives from the ideas which underlie this section, without falling into a too labored or trifling allegorical interpretation of subordinate details, e. g. such hymns as W. C. Dessler's "Friend of souls, how well is me," A. Dresе's "Bridegroom are Samuel and the prophets of his school; following their directions Israel soon found his Lord in the days of David (ver. 4). Burrowes: In ii. 8–17, our Lord allures us by the beauty of heaven; iii. 1–5 describes a "season of spiritual desertion," differing from v. 2–8, "in this respect that in the latter the beloved is repulsed by neglect, while in the former nothing of that kind seems mentioned." Patrick remarks upon the words "on my bed," iii. 1: "This is expounded with strange variety by interpreters; some understanding hereby the bed of affliction, others the bed of ease and pleasure, others of weakness and infirmity, etc. But I have taken both bed and night in the most simple sense, to signify the time and place for most composed thoughts; comp. Ps. iv. 4"].

of souls," P. GERHARD's "Why then should I grieve?" L. LAURENTIUS' "Take courage, ye pious," CHR. SCRIVER's "Life of my soul,"* etc.

* In the hymn of SCRIVER above quoted the refrain at the end of each stanza is "I am thine and thou art mine, I will no other's be."—P. GERHARD's "Why then should I grieve?" ends with the following stanzas, suggestive of the same passage (Cant. ii. 6), as well as of iii. 4:

Lord, my Shepherd, fount of pleasure,
Thou art mine, I am Thine,
No one can us sever.
I am Thine, for me Thou savest,
And Thy blood, for my good,
On the Cross Thou gavest.

Thou art mine, and I embrace Thee,
Nought has might, O my Light,
From my heart t' erase Thee.
Let me come, O bring me thither;
Thou with me, I with Thee,
For aye shall be together.

In LAURENTIUS' Advent Hymn, "Take courage, ye pious," the fourth stanza, which describes the speedy coming of the bridegroom, is based upon the beautiful description of the reviving life of spring ii. 11-13:

He'll not be long delayed,
Up from thy sleep arise;
The trees in bloom arrayed,
And fair spring's brightening skies
Times of refreshing pledge.
Predicts a beauteous day
The evening bathed in red,
The darkness flees away, etc.

[As samples of English sacred verse suggested by this portion of the Song of Solomon may be mentioned the familiar hymns of WATT's, "The voice of my beloved sounds," "Hark! the Redeemer from on high," "Often I seek my Lord by night," "Of all the joys we mortals know;" and upon the Song generally WATTS' Hymns, Book I. 66-78. Translations of some of the German hymns named in the text may be found in the Lyra Germanica and in Dr. SCHAFF's "Christ in Song."—TR.]

THIRD SONG.

The solemn bringing of the Bride and the marriage at Jerusalem.

CHAP. III. 6.—V. 1.

FIRST SCENE:

THE ENTRY OF THE BRIDAL PAIR INTO JERUSALEM.

(CHAP. III. 6-11).

DAUGHTERS OF JERUSALEM (as spectators of the bridal procession).

6 Who[1] is this coming[2] up out of the wilderness, like pillars of smoke,
perfumed[3] with myrrh and frankincense, with[4] every powder[5] of the merchant?—
7 Lo![6] Solomon's[7] own palanquin,[8] sixty heroes about it of the heroes[9] of Israel.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 [WIC.: The Synagogue, of the Church. MAT.: The voice of the Synagogue marvelling in itself at the Church of Christ].

2 [Dow.: That ascendeth by the desert as a little rod].

3 The Masoretic מְקֻטֶּרֶת, for which מְקַטֶּרֶת (AQ., SYMM., VULG., LUTHER, SCHLOTTM. [so FRY]) is a mere shift to obtain an easier reading, is more correctly rendered "surrounded with perfumes," or "thoroughly perfumed," than with some recent interpreters "exhaling odors" (EWALD, UMBR., MEIER, REN.), [or "fuming," TAYLOR, WILLIAMS]; comp. WEISSBACH in loc. and the τεθυμιαμένη of the SEPT. [COV., MAT., CRAN., As it were a smell of].

4 This expression is also dependent upon מְקֻטֶּרֶת, so that מִן in מִכֹּל is consequently not comparative (DÖPKE) [so WILLIAMS, TAYLOR, doubtfully suggested also by AINSWORTH], but partitive as in i. 2. The clause if completed would therefore read: "Selected as aromatic powder from out of every sort of aromatic powder of the merchant, i. e. the best of all aromatic powders."

5 אֲבָקָה properly denotes simply "dust," but is here necessarily the dust of pounded spices. [Comp. ENG. VER., 1 Kin. x. 15. COV., MAT., CRAN., All manner spices. DOW., Aromatical spices. GENEV., All the spices].

6 [WIC., MAT.: The voice of the Church].

7 Literally: "Lo, his palanquin which is to Solomon." שֶׁל with the preceding suffix has an intensive signification, as i. 6; viii. 12.

8 [So rendered by GOOD, TAYLOR, PARKHURST, WILLIAMS, FRY, WITHINGTON, WEISS., GINSBURG. HARMER has "litter, palanquin or something of that sort;" so MOODY STUART, ROBINSON in GES. Lex., DAVIDSON in FUERST's Lex. NOYES: Carriage, a kind of open vehicle now usually called a palanquin; WICLIFFE: litil bed (litter); MATTHEWS: bedstead; other English versions: bed. Four different words are rendered "bed" in the authorised English Version of this Song: מִטָּה in this passage, עֶרֶשׂ in i. 16, מִשְׁכָּב in iii. 1, and עֲרוּגָה (a garden bed) in v. 13; vi. 2.—TR.]

9 On גִּבֹּרֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל comp. the precisely analogous expression גִּבּוֹרֵי בָבֶל Jer. li. 30.

8 All of them practised[1] with the sword, trained to war,[2] each with his sword upon his thigh against[3] fear in the nights.
9 A litter[4] has king Solomon made for himself of the wood of Lebanon.
10 Its pillars he made of silver, its support[5] of gold, its seat[6] of purple;
its interior[7] was embroidered, from love, by the daughters of Jerusalem — 11 Come[8] out, ye daughters of Zion, and see king Solomon with[9] the crown wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his nuptials and in the day of the gladness of his heart.

SECOND SCENE:

SOLOMON AND SHULAMITH (at the wedding feast in the royal palace).

(CHAP. IV. 1.–V. 1.)

SOLOMON.

IV. 1. [10]Lo! thou art fair, my dear; lo! thou art fair, thine eyes (are) doves[11] behind thy veil;[12]

[1] אֲחֻזֵי חֶרֶב lit. "taken of the sword," grasped, held by the sword, i. e. familiar with its management, practised in its use; comp. the like intransitive use of passive participles such as בָּטוּחַ, שָׁכוּן, זָכוּר (Ps. ciii. 14; cxii. 7; Judg. viii. 11), etc. [GENEV.: They all handle the sword. WICL., followed by the rest of the Eng. versions: holding swords; upon which GOOD remarks: "This is obviously inaccurate; for in the next member of the verse we are expressly told that their swords were undrawn and girt upon their thighs." HODGSON: "holders, possessors of swords, that is, warriors;" so MOODY STUART. GINSBURG: "skilled in the sword"].

[2] With מְלֻמְּדֵי מִלְחָמָה comp. the Homeric διδασκόμενος πολέμοιο, Il. 16, 811; only מְלֻמְּדֵי is a past participle. [The Hebrew participles do not, properly speaking, express relations of time. See GREEN'S Heb. Gram. § 266].

[3] מִן here has the sense of מִהְיוֹת "that there may not be terror," etc. [GOOD: against the peril of the night; THRUPP: against nightly alarm]. EWALD'S explanation "out of fear" is accordingly to be rejected; so is that of ROSENMUELLER, DÖPKE, VAIHINGER, etc., who render מִן because of. [So ENG. VER]. Comp. פַּחַד לָיְלָה Ps. xci. 5.

[4] [WICL.: Of Christ and of the Church chosen of the Gentiles. He renders אַפִּרְיוֹן "chair;" COV., MAT.: bedstead; CRAN., BISH.: palace; GENEV.: palace or chariot (marg.); ENG. VER.: chariot or bed (marg.); DOW.: portable throne; GOOD: bridal couch; WILLIAMS: "carriage." which he explains as a "kind of palanquin of state;" MOODY STUART: "not a wheeled carriage but a litter or palanquin;" WORDSWORTH: litter or palanquin or sedan; TAYLOR, FRY, WITHINGTON, THRUPP, GINSBURG: palanquin; WEISS, who explains it of the most holy place in Solomon's temple: throne-chamber].

[5] רְפִידָה is scarcely the cover, the canopy of the sedan (EWALD, MAGN.), or the bottom of the couch (WEISSBACH), but rather its support for the back, as most recent interpreters correctly assume, with an eye to the SEPT. (ἀνάκλιτον) and the VULG. (reclinatorium). [WICL.: the leaning place; COV., MAT., CRAN., BISH.: covering; GENEV.: pavement; DOW.: seat; so WITHINGTON; ENG. VER.: bottom; GOOD: its inside (the wrought roof); TAYLOR: canopy; WILLIAMS: carpet; FRY: mattress; GINSBURG: support, that which supports the back when sitting; so WORDSWORTH, THRUPP; NOYES: railing; WEISS: overlaying (i. e. wainscot, plating)].

[6] מֶרְכָּב from רָכַב "to sit upon" is here unmistakably a "seat;" comp. Lev. xv. 9. [WICL.: the steiging up, identical in sense with the DOWAY: the going up, i. e the perpendicular sides; COV., MAT., CRAN., BISH.: seat, so WILLIAMS, THRUPP, NOYES; GENEV.: hangings, so GOOD, FRY, MOODY STUART, WEISS; ENG. VER.; covering; TAYLOR: the carriage body].

[7] [WICL.: The midst he adorned (DOWAY: covered) with charity for the daughters of Jerusalem. COV., MAT., CRAN.: the ground pleasantly paved for, etc. BISH.: the ground pleasantly paved with love. GENEV.: paved with the love of the daughters, etc. ENG. VER.: paved with love for, etc. WILLIAMS: lined (FRY: spread over) with love by, etc. GOOD: its covering is paved with needle work by his best beloved among the daughters, etc. NOYES: its interior curiously wrought by a lovely one of the, etc. GINSBURG: tesselated most lovely by, etc. THRUPP: tesselated with love because of, etc. WEISS: within it is strewn of love, etc].

[8] [WICL.: The voice of the Church, of Christ. MAT.: The Church speaking of Christ]. צְאֶינָה for צְאנָה for the sake of the assonance here designed with רְאֶינָה; see EWALD, Lehrb. § 198, b. [GREEN'S Heb. Gram. § 164, 3].

[9] [WICL., DOW.: in the diadem. THRUPP: gaze on king Solomon and on the crown].

[10] [WICL. The voice of Christ to the church. MAT. The voice of Christ. MAT., COV.: O how fair art thou, my love; how fair art thou; thou hast dove's eyes besides that which lieth hid within. Thy hairy locks are like a flock of sheep that be clipped, which go first up from the washing place.]

[11] [GENEV.: Thine eyes are like the dove's. DOW.: thine eyes as it were of doves. ENG. VER. thou hast dove's eyes.]

[12] EWALD takes מִבַּעַד to be synonymous with מִסָּבִיב and צַמָּה in the sense of "tress, lock of hair" (i. e. "about thy locks," similarly also UMBREIT). HENGSTENB. follows LUTHER in translating "between thy braids." But צַמָּה related to the CHALD. צַמְצֵם, צַמֵּם "to cover" (comp. TARG. on Gen xxxviii. 15.) cannot, as appears from Isa. xlvii. 2, mean anything but "veil;" and this meaning decides likewise in the case of מִבַּעַד in favor of the signification "forth from behind" or "through." [WICL.: Without it that within is hid. DOW.: besides that which lieth hid within. GENEV. "among thy locks" connected with what follows. ENG. VER., within thy locks; so AINSWORTH, GOOD, TAYLOR. FRY: tresses; THRUPP: plaits; PARKHURST, PERCY, WILLIAMS, WITHINGTON, WEISS, GINSBURG, WORDSWORTH: veil].

thy hair like a flock of goats, reposing[1] on Mount Gilead.
2 Thy teeth like a flock of shorn[2] sheep, which have come up from the washing,
all of which bear[3] twins,
and a bereaved one is not among them.
3 Like a crimson thread[4] thy lips, and thy mouth[5] (is) lovely;
like a piece of pomegranate thy cheek[6]
behind thy veil.
4 Like the tower of David thy neck, built for an armoury;[7]
a thousand bucklers are hung upon it, all the shields[8] of heroes.
5 Thy two breasts are like two fawns,
twins of a gazelle,
that are feeding among lilies.

SHULAMITH.

6 Until[9] the day cools and the shadows flee,
I will get me to the mountain of myrrh and to the hill of frankincense.

SOLOMON.

7 Thou[10] art all fair, my dear, and there is not a blemish in thee.—
8 With me from Lebanon, my bride, with me from Lebanon thou shalt come;
shalt journey[11] from the top of Amana, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from dens[12] of lions,
from mountains of panthers.
9 Thou hast ravished[13] my heart, my sister, my bride, hast ravished my heart with one of thy glances, with one chain of thy necklace.

[1] Literally, "which have couched (שֶׁגָּלְשׁוּ) from Mount Gilead downward (מֵהַר גִּלְעָד) i. e. not "at the foot" of this mountain, but on it, so that they are visible to the beholder in a line from its summit. [Dow. which have come up from; Cran., Bish.: are shorn. Genev.: look down from; Eng. Ver appear from, or eat of (marg); Parkhurst: glisten; Fry, after Schultens; go in the morning to water; Withington, hang over the clefts of; Thrupp, hanging down the slope of; Ginsburg after Fuerst in his Lex. (not his Concord. where he has "decumbere, considere") "springing down."]

[2] קְצוּבוֹת literally "shorn" viz.: sheep, רְחֵלִים vi. 6. [Cran.: Thy teeth are like sheep of the same bigness, which went up from the washing place. Genev.: a flock of sheep in good order.

[3] [Ginsb. "paired; the Hiphil of תָּאַם to be double, to be pairs (Ex. xxvi. 24; xxxvi. 29) is to make double, to make pairs, to appear paired." Fry quotes from Henley's note in Gregory's translation of Lowth's Lectures; "The Arabic verb denotes not only to bring forth twins, but also to have a companion."]

[4] [Dow.: Scarlet lace: Cov., Mat., Cran., Bish., rose-colored ribbon; Genev., Eng. Ver., thread of scarlet.]

[5] [Wicl.: thy fair speech sweet; Cov., Mat., thy words are lovely; Genev.: thy talk is comely; Eng. Ver. thy speech is comely.]

[6] [Wicl., Cov., Mat., Cran., Bish., Dow.; cheeks. Genev., Eng. Ver. temples.]

[7] [Wicl.: with pinnacles. Cov., Mat., Dow.: with bulwarks. Cran., Bish.: with costly stones lying out on the sides. Genev., for defence. Ginsburg follows Rashi and Rashbam in taking תַּלְפִּיּוֹת as a contraction for תַּאֲלְפִיּוֹת from אָלַף to teach, and renders: "for the builder's model, i. e. so that architects might learn their designs from it!"]

[8] [Wicl. The armor of strong men. Cov., Mat., Cran., Bish.: the weapons of the giants. Dow.: the armor of the valiants.]

[9] [Mat. The spouse speaketh to himself. O that I might go to the mountain of myrrh and to the hill of frankincense till the day break and the shadows be past away.]

[10] [Mat. The voice of Christ speaking to the church.]

[11] תָּשׁוּרִי parallel with תָּבוֹאִי must be derived from שׁוּר in the sense of "journeying, travelling," confirmed by Isa. lvii. 9, not in that of "looking" (for which it is true Num. xxiii. 9, might be adduced); comp. Sept. (ἐλεύσῃ καὶ διελεύσῃ), Syr., Köst., Magn., Böttch, Hitz, etc. [This argument cannot be esteemed decisive except upon the assumption that parallel clauses must be identical in signification, which is not always nor even usually the case. Wicl., Dow.: thou shalt be crowned. Other Eng. Versions, look].

[12] [Wicl. from the couching lions and the hill of paradise. Withington: from the cottages of Araoth, from the hills of Nemairim].

[13] In relation to this privative sense of לִבֵּב comp. e. g. סִקֵּל "to free from stones" (Isa. v. 2), שֵׁרֵשׁ "to uproot" (Ps. lii. 7; Job xxxi. 12), etc.; and for the thought comp. Ovid's "oculos, qui rapuere meos" and the Greek θέλγειν which differs from βασκαίνειν in expressing an enchantment by love. [Wicl., Cov., Mat., Genev., Dow., wounded. Cran., Bish., bewitched. Eng. Ver. marg.: taken away. Ginsb.: emboldened. Noyes: taken captive. Weiss, who compares the German herzen to press to the heart: cherished.]

10 How fair is thy love,[1] my sister, my bride, how much better thy love than wine, and the fragrance of thy unguents than all spices.
11 Liquid honey thy lips distil, my bride, honey and milk are under thy tongue, and the fragrance of thy garments is like the fragrance of Lebanon.[2] 12 A garden locked[3] is my sister, my bride, a spring locked, a fountain sealed.
13 Thy plants are an orchard of pomegranates, with most excellent fruit;
cypress flowers with nards,
14 Nard and crocus, calamus and cinnamon, with every variety of incense-woods;
myrrh and aloes,
with all the chief spice plants.
15 A garden spring[4] art thou, a well of living water, and streams[5] from Lebanon.

SHULAMITH.

16 Awake,[6] north wind, and come thou south, blow upon my garden that its spices[7] may flow!
Let[8] my beloved come to his garden and eat his excellent fruits.[9]

SOLOMON.

V. 1 I[10] come to my garden, my sister, my bride,
I pluck my myrrh with my balsam,
I eat my honeycomb[11] with my honey,
I drink my wine with my milk.—
(turning to the wedding guests):
Eat[12] friends, drink,[13] and drink to repletion, beloved.

1 [WICL. teats. COV., MAT., CRAN., BISH., DOW.: breasts].
2 [WICL. incense. COV., MAT., DOW.: frankincense.]
3 [ENG. VER. inclosed, or barred (marg). COV., MAT.: Thou art a well-kept garden, O my sister, my spouse, thou art a well kept water spring, a sealed well. The fruits that sprout in thee are like a very paradise of pomegranates with sweet fruits.]
4 [THRUPP proposes a needless change of text: "The Hebrew text has מַעְיַן גַּנִּים 'a fountain of gardens.' This seems inappropriate: partly because the introduction of the 'gardens' tends to confusion with the previous image, partly because as that spoke of 'a garden' in the singular, we should hardly here have mention of 'gardens' in the plural. HOUBIGANT conjectured with unusual felicity, that for גנים we should read גלים; and this though unconfirmed by external authority, has so strongly the appearance of being the true reading, that we may without much rashness venture to accept it. The word denotes the waves of the fountain continually welling upwards.]
5 [COV., MAT., CRAN., BISH.: which run down. DOW.: which run with violence.]
6 [MAT. Christ calleth the heathen.]
7 [בְּשָׂמִים, here not the solid aromatic substances themselves as ver. 14, but the odors streaming from them; יִזְּלוּ the assonance with נֹזְלִים ver. 15, appears to be intentional. [COV., MAT., CRAN., BISH.: the smell thereof may be carried on every side.]
8 [In WICLIFFE's and the DOWAY BIBLE as in the VULGATE the fifth chapter begins here. WICL. The church saith of Christ.]
9 [COV., MAT.: eat of the fruits and apples that grow therein. DOW.: fruits of his apple trees.]
10 [WICL.: Christ saith to the church. MAT.: Christ speaketh to the church. WICL., COV., MAT.: Come into my garden O my sister, my spouse.]
11 [יַעַר lit. "a wood, thicket" here denotes the honey-comb, as in 1 Sam. xiv. 27 the feminine form יַעְרָה (יַעְרַת הַדְּבַשׁ) prop. the rough or harsh in honey in contrast with the smoothly flowing.]
12 [WICL. Christ to the Apostles saith. MAT. Christ speaketh to the Apostles.]
13 [WICL.: be inwardly made drunken. COV., MAT., CRAN., BISH.: be merry, O ye beloved. GENEV.: make you merry, O well-beloved. ENG. VER.: drink abundantly, O beloved; marg. be drunken with loves.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The contents of this section rightly understood, place it beyond doubt that iii. 6-11 describes a bridal procession, i. e., the solemn bringing of a bride to her marriage, and iv. 1—v. 1 the marriage itself, or more exactly the loving conversation of the newly wedded pair at their nuptial feast. The dramatic vividness and life of the description reaches its highest point precisely in this middle section of the piece, and in fact, RENAN seems to be not altogether wrong when he says of it, or at least of its first scene (iii. 6–11): "No portion bears so many traces as this of a real representation, and even of a certain amount of stage apparatus and of costumes." Yet the thought of an actual performance (even if only in the private circle of a family engaged in a wedding feast, as RENAN proposes, pp. 88, ff.) is forbidden first by the fact that the dramatic style is not sufficiently sustained in the other acts, e. g. that which immediately precedes with its simple monologue; and secondly by the scanty change of person and the character of the dialogue in both the scenes of this act, which is more lyrical and subjective than dramatic and objective. For in the first instance with regard to iii. 6–11, the speaker in this section, although not the poet himself (HERDER, UMBREIT), is simply the band of the "daughters of Zion," ver. 11, whilst the principal personages, Solomon and Shulamith, remain mere objects of sight to these women of Jerusalem, and attended by a brilliant retinue pass mutely over the stage. Now since the spectators designated in ver. 11 as the daughters of Zion, are scarcely different from the "daughters of Jerusalem" elsewhere introduced (comp. on ver. 11), and little or nothing that is well founded can be alleged in favor of the assumption of those recent writers, who conceive the speakers to be "citizens" or "residents" of Jerusalem (EWALD, MAGNUS, DELITZSCH, HITZIG, RENAN), or "men and women" alternately (BÖTTCHER), or "courtiers of Solomon" even (WEISSBACH), it is just the chorus of the piece that speaks exclusively in this scene, the same chorus which made its appearance both speaking and acting only in the first part of the first act, while in the second part it withdrew more into the background, and in the second act did not come into view at all. A partition of the several utterances contained in the four strophes of the section (ver. 6, vers. 7, 8, vers. 9, 10, ver. 11) among different persons or groups of persons in the chorus is perhaps admissible, and this most probably so that the first three strophes may with DELITZSCH be put into the mouth of different particular groups, and the last (ver. 11) assigned to the whole body of spectators, or to "the entire festive multitude." Yet no greater multiplicity or life is thus gained for the action after all, for the discourse continues nevertheless to be limited exclusively to the persons of the chorus.—Again in iv. 1—v. 1 it is only Solomon and Shulamith, who are engaged in conversation, although they are not alone, but as v. 1 shows, in company with the merrily feasting wedding guests. The attempts of HITZIG and RENAN to bring more life and variety into the action by introducing the shepherd from ver. 8 onward, are to be rejected as empty conceits; especially that of the latter who makes the shepherd stand "at the foot of the seraglio-tower" (au pied de la tour de serail) as a languishing lover, and speak all from ver. 8 to ver. 16 a to his beloved, until she finally grants him admission, and he then v. 1 "celebrates together with the chorus the triumph of his love" (similarly also BÖTTCHER). The whole impression especially of what the enraptured bridegroom says in his description of the charms of his bride (iv. 1 ff., 9 ff.) is that of an extremely simple action, which aims at a description of the feelings of the loving pair at the celebration of their marriage and the utterances of their emotion far more than at an exhibition of what they did, and consequently betrays again more of a lyrical than a strictly dramatic character. But even if there really were reason to assume a scenic representation or at least a seriously intended destination to that end, no such indecent contents could in any case be admitted in this representation, as HITZIG and RENAN maintain, the former by his assertion that with what the bridegroom says v. 1 his conjugal embrace of the bride begins before the eyes of the spectators (!); the latter by his remark upon what he takes to be the words of the shepherd "Il se rassure sur sa fidélité (!), etc. With as little propriety could a burlesque character be attributed to the representation, as is done by BÖTTCHER, who e. g. sees in v. 1*c* a direction from the shepherd to his comrades to fall upon the wine and the provisions of the wedding table and to drink themselves drunk.—Moreover the bride is with most of the recent interpreters (even UMBREIT, EWALD, VAIHINGER, RENAN, and most of the other advocates of the shepherd-hypothesis) to be supposed to be no other than Shulamith, and she exalted to the rank of a queen in the proper sense, a wife of Solomon preferred before all others, as is shown by the appellation "my sister bride," which is first used in iv. 9 ff., and further by the passage vi. 8, 9, as well as the fact that Shulamith is subsequently denominated a "prince's daughter," vii. 2. Neither iii. 6 where "out of the wilderness" is by no means to be explained of a coming of the bride from the south, nor iii. 11 (see in loc.) stands opposed to this assumption or compels a return to the opinion of many of the older writers that the bride was a daughter of Pharaoh coming up from Egypt. Solomon is besides to be thought of as participating in the festive procession, whether we imagine him seated in the sedan along with his bride or on horseback at the side of it. For the marriage customs of ancient Israel required (comp. 1 Macc. ix. 37, 39, and see above, p. 60) the bridegroom to bring the bride from the house of her parents with an honorable escort even though the distance from thence to his residence amounted to one or to several days' journey. And an intimation appears to be contained (ver. 8) in the mention of the "terrors of the nights" (see in loc.) that he had in fact conducted her by a march of several days to Jerusalem, and consequently had himself brought her from her home in Shunem. Against the view of DELITZSCH and SCHLOTTMANN ("Der Brautzug des Hohenlieds," Stud. und Krit., 1867, II., 289 f.) that Solomon himself was not with the bridal procession, but simply awaited its arrival, and at length, when it had come near enough, went forth from his palace to show himself to the bride and likewise to the festive multitude, may be urged not indeed the mention of the "sedan of Solomon" in ver. 7, for this is not necessarily a sedan in which Solomon himself is sitting, but the circumstance that Solomon is mentioned (ver. 11) in a manner which implies that he was with the festive procession rather than going to meet it or receiving it at the door of his palace. The contents of the preceding act had also prepared the way for Solomon's going to Shulamith and fetching her to Jerusalem himself, comp. p. 60.—After what has been already remarked, there can be no further doubt respecting the locality of the two scenes. In iii. 6–11 it is some street in Jerusalem, or more exactly (see ver. 6) an open area at one of the gates of the city, commanding a prospect of the desert region stretching north-east from the city toward Jericho (comp. DELITZSCH's somewhat too indefinite statement of the scene: "Neighborhood of Jerusalem and the city itself"). In iv. 1 to v. 1, however, it is the wedding hall of the royal palace, in which the newly married pair carry on their cosy talk somewhat apart from the guests sitting at the festive table; a hall which we must perhaps conceive (see on iv. 6) to have been immediately adjoining a garden and open outwards like the locality in the first act.—Between scene 1 and 2 we may perhaps suppose the marriage ceremony to have been performed by some of the priestly order; for according to Prov. ii. 17; Mal. ii. 14, such a religious act undoubtedly took place at the weddings of the ancient Hebrews (see the exegetical explanation of the former passage, in the commentary on Proverbs); and in chap. iv Solomon no longer speaks to his beloved as if they were simply betrothed, but as if they were actually married, see especially ver. 12 ff. With no valid reasons for it HITZIG makes the wedding ceremony take place between iv. 8 and 9. For the allegation that the language of Solomon does not become really "fond, affecting and languishing" until ver. 9 is purely subjective, and is not verified by the contents of vers. 9–16, comp. with vers. 1-7; and even if it were correct, it would not prove that a pause is to be assumed between vers. 8 and 9 to be filled up by the solemnization of the marriage.

2. THE BRIDAL PROCESSION, iii. 6-11.—FIRST STROPHE, ver. 6.

Ver. 6. Who is this coming up out of the wilderness? This "exclamation of admiration and praise" ("voz de admiracion y de loor" according to LUIS DE LEON) certainly does not refer to the sedan of Solomon approaching the city (HITZIG, WEISSBACH) any more than it does to Solomon with his retinue, as though מִי זֹאת were here to be taken as a neuter: "what is this," etc., (EWALD and others); [so PERCY, GOOD, TAYLOR, WILLIAMS, GINSBURG]. The answer to the question here, as in the two passages (vi. 10 and viii. 5) where it recurs verbatim, can be no other than "Shulamith," the expected bride of the king, the heroine of the day, the prime object of interest and of curiosity to the residents of Jerusalem (correctly explained by all the older interpreters and among the more recent by DELITZSCH, VAIHINGER, HENGSTENBERG, SCHLOTTMANN, etc.). It is in their name and as expressive of their feelings that the chorus now speaks.

The verb "come up," literally "ascend" (עלה) simply denotes the ascent from the lower level of the surrounding country to the city situated upon a high mountain (comp. 1 Kin. xii. 28, etc.), not the perpendicular ascent of the pillar of smoke, with which Shulamith is compared in what follows, (HITZIG, WEISSBACH.) — Upon מִן־הַמִּדְבָּר SCHLOTTMANN correctly remarks: "'From the wilderness' is merely intended to suggest a general conception as if in describing a similar entry into one of our cities we were to say 'from the country.' The immediate vicinity of ancient Jerusalem was richly adorned with gardens and orchards, such as are not wholly wanting even now." For proof that an extremely desolate and barren rocky waste lies between Jerusalem and Jericho, and consequently in the very direction from which the festive procession coming from the north of Palestine must approach the city, comp. the unanimous accounts of modern travellers in Palestine, e. g., one of the latest, K. FURRER (Wanderungen, etc., p. 147): "How silent and solitary it was here, (viz., immediately beyond Bethany)! We looked in vain for a hut. Briers and fragments of rock covered the declivities. Yet even in this barren region small flocks of sheep and goats found here and there a scanty subsistence," etc. Comp. also ROBINSON's Physical Geography of the Holy Land.—Like pillars of smoke. תִּימְרוֹת עָשָׁן (or תִּמְרוֹת עָשָׁן, Joel iii. 8) are neither "elationes fumi" as though the root, from which it is derived, were אמר=ימר "to be high" (EWALD, WEISSBACH), nor "clouds of smoke, whirls of smoke" (from מור=ימר agitatus fuit,—HENGSTENBERG), but palm-like high and slender pillars of smoke, as is shown by the unmistakably close affinity between תימרה and תמר "palm" [so BURROWES, WEISS]. The expression is, therefore, a poetical and descriptive synonym of the prosaic עַמּוּד עָשָׁן "pillar of smoke" Judg. xx. 40. Comp. KLEUKER: "A vertically ascending column of steam, which spreads out at the top into small clouds, has the shape of a palm-tree, whose upright trunk first rises in like manner high in the air and then divides into a like bushy crown." The tertium comparationis in the comparison of the approaching bride of the king with pillars of smoke is moreover two-fold: it is intended to set forth her slender, stately appearance and the dense volume of rare perfumes which stream forth from her (or her sedan) to delight the sense (comp. SCHLOTTMANN in loc.). In the worst possible taste, HITZIG: The figure has reference to the sedan, which is to be conceived of as "perhaps higher than it was long," and, since it rested on the shoulders of its tall bearers, as "projecting perpendicularly upwards." — Perfumed with myrrh and incense. As Prov. vii. 17 a bed and Ps. xlv. 9 the garments of the royal bridegroom, so here the bride coming to her wedding or more particularly her sedan and her dress are filled with refreshing perfumes (Prov. xxvii. 9). Comp. what CURTIUS RUFUS (VIII. 9, 23) relates of aromatic fumigations in the public processions of the kings of ancient India, as well as the accounts of modern travellers, such as TAVERNIER, etc., respecting the custom formerly in vogue at the Turkish court in Constantinople of burning incense and aloes in silver chafing dishes at the formal reception of foreign ambassadors * (SCHMIDT, Bibl. Geographus, p. 78).

* ["The bride of Solomon is represented here as perfumed in a solemn procession made upon occasion of the king's entering with her into Jerusalem. The virgins went out to meet them, iii. 11; they burnt odors before them with a profusion that became a royal wedding, so that the smoke ascended like pillars. Or these pillars of smoke may refer to the burning perfumes in Jerusalem as a preparative for the reception of the royal pair." HARMER. "The bride was so richly provided with perfumes that they curled up in dense columns of smoke, visible at a distance as the procession moved along." THRUPP. "It is commonly supposed that the slender and

SECOND STROPHE, vers. 7, 8 (probably spoken by a different group of the women of Jerusalem from the first, comp. above No. 1.)

Ver. 7. Lo! Solomon's own palanquin.—The spectators beholding the procession now already quite near, perceive that the magnificent couch in the centre of it belongs to no less a person than Solomon himself, and hence immediately infer the high rank of her who sits within it, which is made still more apparent by the splendid surroundings of the palanquin.—Sixty heroes about it of the heroes of Israel—i. e., probably from the number of those six hundred heroes or "mighty men" (גִּבּוֹרִים), with whom David had surrounded himself as his guard of honor or his general staff (comp. 2 Sam. x. 7; [xv. 18]; xvi. 6; xx. 7; xxiii. 8 ff.) and which undoubtedly still formed under Solomon the flower of the Israelitish army, or in part at least, a sort of standing body-guard about the king (comp. 2 Sam. xv. 1; 1 Kings i. 5). At any rate, the sixty heroes here appear as a guard of honor, which had attended him on his bridal journey for his beloved.†

Ver. 8. Against fear in the nights—i. e., that fear may not be excited in the nights; for פַּחַד is not objective terror, that which produces terror (DELITZSCH, HENGSTENBERG,) [GINSBURG], but subjective terror, being frightened out of sleep (Job iv. 14; Ruth iii. 8). The meaning is evidently this: to secure her while travelling from sudden alarm and consequent disturbance of her slumber at night upon her way to Jerusalem (not after her arrival there, as HITZIG claims), the sixty sword-begirt heroes were assigned to her as her escort. As the journey from Shunem to Jerusalem amounts to about fifty miles in a direct course, and consequently made it necessary to pass at least one and perhaps two nights on the route, and this very probably in a wild solitary region (בַּמִּדְבָּר, ver. 6), such a military escort was by no means superfluous. At a later time also, when Shulamith was urging a return to her home (vii. 12), she takes for granted that it would be necessary to spend several nights in villages upon the way.

THIRD STROPHE. Vers. 9, 10 (again spoken by a fresh division of the chorus).

Ver. 9. A litter has King Solomon made for himself.—אַפִּרְיוֹן, though difficult of explanation etymologically, denotes according to the ancient versions and rabbinical tradition a portable couch, a litter (according to KIMCHI, a bride's litter* in particular; a similar view in Sot. IX. 14). It is therefore to be regarded as identical with the מִטָּה, ver. 7. In opposition to HITZIG, who declares the two to be distinct, and places the king in the מִטָּה, and the bride, whom he thinks to be coming to meet him, in the אַפִּרְיוֹן see particularly SCHLOTTMANN, p. 229 ff.; also WEISSBACH, p. 177, who correctly observes that the remark before us, as well as that contained in strophe 2 (vers. 7, 8), is related to the question in ver. 6, and must therefore, like that first answer, point to a female person as the occupant of the litter referred to. In an etymological point of view, HITZIG's explanation of אַפִּרְיוֹן as related to the Sanskrit paryâna, "saddle, riding-saddle," and consequently as not properly denoting a couch for lying down, but a portable chair (comp. the SYR., which takes the word as a synonyme of כִּסֵּא), may deserve to be preferred above all others, especially if we might also adduce with it the Indian paryang; "bed," compared by BÖTTCHER (Suppl. Lex. Aram., p. 49). For neither the derivation from the Greek attempted long ago by JEROME (on Isa. vii. 14), as though it were identical with the φορεῖον of the SEPT. (so among the later writers, MAGNUS and SCHLOTTMANN), nor the various recent attempts to refer it to some Semitic root, e. g., to the Chald. פרא, currere (hence properly equivalent to currus, GESENIUS) [chariot, ENG. VER.], or to פאר=פרא, "to be handsomely adorned, to shine" (WEISSBACH), or to פרה, whether in the sense of "spreading out," or in that of "cutting neatly, executing elegant workmanship" (EWALD, MEIER, DELITZSCH, etc., all of whom compare the Chald. פּוּרְיָא, bed), or finally to פרר—פרה, ferri (WISEMAN, Hor. Syr., and GESEN.-DIETR. in the Handwörterbuch, comparing the "ferculum" of the Vulg. and the Syr. ph'rato, "cradle")—none of these attempts at explanation are really satisfactory in a linguistic point of view. But even if the "Appiryon" is properly a portable seat, it may still be identical with the "Mittah," ver. 7; for as a travelling sedan it was doubtless arranged both for sitting and for reclining, and was spacious enough to afford room for Solomon along with Shulamith. It graceful form of the bride gradually increasing in tallness as she came nearer, is compared to the light and beautiful column of smoke which ascends from a burning censer of incense. But is it not more probable that the dust caused by the approach of the sedan and its attendants is compared to columns of smoke? Or might not the pillars of smoke actually ascend from censers borne in front of the procession?" NOYES. The GENEVAN version here has this note: "This is referred to the church of Israel which was led by the wilderness forty years." "The reference is evident to the marching of the children of Israel through the wilderness, with the pillar of cloud before them and with the pillars of smoke ascending from the altar of incense in the sight of the priests, and from the altar of atonement in the sight of all Israel" MOODY STUART. So allegorical interpreters generally, who find in this one of the indications of the spiritual meaning of the Song. "She came perfumed with myrrh and frankincense, because myrrh was one of the principal ingredients in her holy ointment (Ex. xxx. 22), and incense was offered constantly on the golden altar before the veil; and because myrrh is the symbol of the death and burial to which Christ condescended as man; and because frankincense is the type of prayer offered by Him as our priest and offered to Him as God. And she is perfumed with all the powders or spices of the merchant because all the glories of the ancient ritual are spiritualized in the gospel." WORDSWORTH.]

* ["A travelling litter is here intended." THRUPP. "Either a howdah, to be borne on the back of a camel instead of an elephant, or a palanquin to be carried on the shoulders of men, or to be borne as a litter between two camels, horses or mules." KITTO. WORDSWORTH follows HENGSTENBERG in supposing an allusion to the marriage bed, which is manifestly at variance with the context.—TR.]

† [THRUPP after PATRICK: "The number of David's heroes, 'thirty and seven in all,' was exactly thirty exclusive of those who stood superior to the rest in rank; and if the number three-score have any definite meaning in the present verse, it is probably to be taken as the double of the number of the heroes of David's reign. A comparison, however, of this verse with vi. 8 may furnish ground for regarding sixty as a determinate number used for an indeterminate." WORDSWORTH allegorizes thus: "twice thirty, twice David's number, because the two armies of Christ's soldiers (viz.: the Gentile and the Jew) are here represented as united in the army of the peaceful Solomon, Christ."] is more natural, however, and likewise corresponds better with decorum and with the marriage customs of the ancient Hebrews to imagine the king riding along side or seated on a separate litter of a less showy sort. For the Hindoo bridal custom, according to which both bride and groom were carried along together in one large palanquin, can scarcely determine the usage under the Old Testament (comp. SCHLOTTMANN, in loc.).—"Has made for himself" is, according to 2 Sam. xv. 1; 1 Kings i. 5, equivalent to "procured, provided for himself," comparavit sibi, not exactly=faciendum curavit, "caused to be made" (for which Esth. vii. 9 has been alleged).—Of the wood of Lebanon—literally: "from the woods of Lebanon," i. e., from various costly species of wood found on this mountain, particularly cedars and cypresses, comp. 1 Kings v. 10; vi. 15; vii. 2, as well as i. 17 above.*—Its pillars he made of silver.—So that only the frame of the sedan was of those valuable woods, not its various decorations, which belonged to its inner as well as its outer fitting up. עַמּוּדִים are not the feet of the couch, as though the κλίναι ἀργυρόποδες (XENOPH., Anab. IV., 4, 21; Athen. II., 9), or the Roman tables with silver legs (Juven. II., 128), were to be compared, but the small pillars designed mainly for ornament, not as supports, with which the sedan was embellished; comp. the auratæ columnæ of a royal sedan spoken of by CURTIUS, IX. 8, 26, as well as the mention of Indian palanquins with silver pillars by v. ORLICH, Indische Reise, p. 128.—Its seat of purple.—By this are meant not cushions, but costly coverings, which were spread over the hard wooden base; comp. Judg. v. 10; Am. iii. 12; Prov. vii. 16.—Its interior was embroidered from love by the daughters of Jerusalem.—The suffix in תּוֹכוֹ, like that of the three preceding words, can only refer back to the principal subject אַפִּרְיוֹן, not to the purple of the coverings (MAGN., HITZIG). Since the back and the seat have been mentioned before, the "midst" or "inside" of this elegant litter can mean nothing but the sides and top of the same vehicle. The decoration of these inner portions of the sedan is characterized by the participle רָצוּף (from רצף to arrange together, combine, comp. רִצְפָּה, "tesselated pavement"), as consisting in figures arranged together to resemble mosaic, which points to fine embroidery, for these figures cannot be conceived to be upon any thing but the coverings which lined the walls.† Consequently nothing is more obvious than to see in the "daughters of Jerusalem" the makers of this embroidery, and in אַהֲבָה love, which is added to limit the participle רָצוּף the mention of the disposition, impelled by which the daughters of Jerusalem performed this work. The מִן in מִבְּנוֹת is therefore equivalent to "from, or on the part of," and does not introduce the agent after a passive verb * (as HITZIG and other opponents of this construction suppose), which would certainly be contrary to usage. The SEPT. is substantially correct, only אַהֲבָה is taken as in recent times, e. g., by VAIHINGER, in the sense of a "token or gift of love:" so HERDER, DELITZSCH and others. On the contrary, it is incorrectly rendered by LUTHER (who partially follows the VULGATE): "paved within in a lovely manner for the sake of the daughters at Jerusalem;" also by UMBREIT: "adorned from love to the daughters of Jerusalem;" HENGSTENB.: "adorned with the love of the daughters of Jerusalem" (as though they were themselves seated inside of the sedan); BÖTTCHER: "adorned with one, who is beloved beyond the daughters of Jerusalem," i. e., far more than they; and finally DOEDERL., EWALD, WEISSBACH, RENAN, HITZIG, SCHLOTTMANN: "adorned with a love from among the daughters of Jerusalem"—as though אַהֲבָה here meant the same as amata (which is in reality not the case either here or any where else in the Song of Solomon; see above on ii. 7 and comp. on vii. 7) or as though instead of this expression we were required in spite of MSS. and versions to read אֲהֻבָה (as in Hos. iii. 1; Deut. xxi. 15) or אֹהָבָה (comp. Hos. ix. 10), as HITZIG in fact proposes. The same interpreter infers from מִבְּנוֹת יְרוּשָׁלָם that the royal bride denoted by אהבה is not Shulamith, but a native of Jerusalem, whilst the rest of the advocates of this last named view take the "daughters of Jerusalem" here in the wider sense of "daughters of Israel" (see particularly SCHLOTTMANN).

FOURTH STROPHE. Ver. 11 (spoken by the whole body of the chorus).

Ver. 11. Come out, daughters of Zion.—This form of address is adopted instead of "daughters of Jerusalem," which had just been used at the close of verse 10, merely for the sake of varying the expression, not to distinguish the ordinary women of the city from the ladies of the court (EWALD, HITZIG, etc.) [so GINSB.]. The coming out here urged is not necessarily the coming out of individuals from their houses; it is sufficient to suppose the interior of the city contrasted with the open space at one of the gates where the action is proceeding (see above No. 1, p. 72).—And gaze at king Solomon with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him, etc. By this crown is neither meant the royal bride herself, as though she were here entitled the crown of her husband as in Prov. xii. 4 (VAIH., HENGSTENB.), nor is the

* [TAYLOR is peculiar in connecting the last words of ver. 9 with ver. 10 thus: "A nuptial palanquin hath king Solomon made for himself. He hath made of Lebanon-wood its pillars (the poles of the palanquin, and perhaps the whole of its woodwork); of silver (tissue) its canopy; of gold (tissue) its lower carriage (lit., the ridden in part, which hangs by cords from the pillars or poles); with purple its middle part (floor) is spread, a present from the daughters of Jerusalem (a finely wrought carpet,) or wrought with an ornamental pattern of needle-work."]

† [PATRICK supposes a reference to the "foot-cloth, which lay at the bottom of the chariot, with elegant figures of shepherds and shepherdesses perhaps and all their innocent courtships." MOODY STUART mentions (without adopting) an opinion also suggested by FRY and Mrs. FRANCIS that "verses expressive of love were wrought into the fabric" of the inner lining. STUART insists upon the strict meaning of a "pavement of stone," and applies the description to the "ark of the covenant with the tables of the law as the chariot of the divine king of Israel."—TR.]

* [So PERCY: "The middle thereof is wrought (in needlework) by the daughters of Jerusalem (as a testimony of their) love." WILLIAMS: "The preposition is not most usually by but from. In the present instance it probably includes both—lined with love by the daughters of Jerusalem, and probably received as a present from them."] expression a general figurative designation of Solomon's sovereignty or his glory as a conqueror (STARKE and many of the older commentators; also HAHN). We are rather to look upon it as a proper festive crown, a wedding coronet of gold and silver (scarcely of fresh flowers), such as probably not only brides but bridegrooms were accustomed to wear at Israelitish weddings, as was the custom at least in later times according to the testimony of the Talmud;* see SELDEN, Uxor Ebr. II. 139 f.; HIRT, de coronis apud Hebræos nuptialibus sponsi sponsæque, Jen. 1748.—That it was no other than Solomon's mother,† who put this crown upon his head, is not to be explained from the fact that mothers generally take a special interest in such matters of ornament (HITZIG), but from a peculiar marriage custom, according to which the mother in token of her approval of the marriage alliance contracted by her son, with her own hand adorned him with a festive crown. It is still a question, however, whether the reference is to that wedding crown, which Solomon had previously worn upon his marriage with the Egyptian princess, 1 Kin. iii. 1, and which in order to distinguish the present new bride above others he had now brought out anew (EWALD), or whether as "the new love deserved a new crown" (HITZIG), we are to assume that the crowning was first performed by Bathsheba in honor of the present nuptial celebration (so the most). The latter assumption is favored not only by the tenor of the words used (see particularly "and in the day of the gladness of his heart" in d) but also by the circumstance that Bathsheba, Solomon's mother, probably survived David, her royal husband, a number of years, and continued to be a highly respected and influential person at the court of Solomon; comp. 1 Kin. i. 11; ii. 13 ff.

3. SOLOMON TO SHULAMITH AT THE WEDDING ENTERTAINMENT, iv. 1-6.

Ver. 1. Lo, thou art fair, my dear, etc.—The verbal correspondence of this praise of Solomon's beauty with i. 15 is designed as in vi. 4 (and so in vi. 10; viii. 5 comp. with iii. 6) to direct attention to Solomon as again the speaker of these words. And it follows with great probability that the person addressed is likewise the same as before, not some new object of the king's love different from Shulamith, as HITZIG asserts. —Behind thy veil.—So correctly HITZIG, VAIH., HEILIGST., etc., with whom BÖTTCH. and GESEN.-DIETR., ("through thy veil," i. e., appearing through) substantially agree.*—Thy hair like a flock of goats which repose on Mount Gilead.—As Gilead is visible from the Mount of Olives in the far distance, but not from Jerusalem, its mention, like that of Lebanon and Hermon in ver. 8, and like so many other allusions in the poem to localities in the north of Palestine, is to be explained from the circumstance that when Solomon was speaking to his beloved, he liked to transport himself to the region of her home with its peculiar circle of impressions and ideas. Gilead is, besides, a mountain land specially rich in cattle (comp. Num. xxxii. 1; Mic. vii. 14; Jer. l. 19), and modern travellers have found it still strewn, as it were, with flocks and herds. Comp. ARVIEUX, II., 688; PAULUS, Reisen, 7, 108; ROSENM., Morgenl., I., 85, etc.—The point of comparison in the figure is to be found mainly in the glossy blackness and luxuriant abundance of Shulamith's hair, perhaps also in its silky softness and delicacy, less likely in her elegant and elaborately braided tresses, to which MAGNUS thinks there was subordinate reference. Old LUIS DE LEON correctly (in Wilkens, p. 219): "He indicated thus the abundance and the color of her hair; for the goats, which pastured there, were dark and glossy. He says therefore: as the goats scattered on the summit of Gilead give it a fine and pretty appearance, whilst before it looked like a bald and arid rock, so does thy hair adorn and ornament thy head by its rich color and abundance."

Ver. 2. Thy teeth like a flock of shorn sheep.—Sheep recently shorn, consequently smooth, and besides just washed in the pool, and hence snow-white, evidently are a peculiarly appropriate figure for dazzling white teeth, provided pastoral figures or those taken from the realm of country life were to be used at all. And this was to a certain extent necessary here; at least it was extremely natural to illustrate the contrast between the blackness of her hair and the whiteness of her teeth by adding a flock of white lambs to the flock of black goats spoken of in ver. 1. The idea of the pool for the sheep spontaneously offered itself, since washing newly shorn sheep was a universal custom in antiquity; comp. COLUMELLA's advice (VII. 4) to wash sheep four days after the shearing.—All of which bear twins, and one bereaved is not among them.—An allusion to the completeness of her teeth, the two rows of which, upper and lower, not only have no breaks, but in every instance exhibit a pair of teeth exactly answering to one another, twin teeth, as it were, throughout.† That sheep in the East are still

* ["It was usual with many nations to put crowns or garlands on the heads of new married persons. The Mishnah informs us that this custom prevailed among the Jews; and it should seem from the passage before us that the ceremony of putting it on was performed by one of the parents. Among the Greeks the bride was crowned by her mother, as appears from the instance of Iphigenia in Euripides, ver. 906. BOCHART supposes the nuptial crown and other ornaments of a bride alluded to in Ezek. xvi. 8-12; Geogr. Sacr. p. 2, l. 1.—The nuptial crowns used among the Greeks and Romans were only chaplets of leaves or flowers. Among the Hebrews they were not only of these, but occasionally of richer materials, as gold or silver, according to the rank or wealth of the parties." PERCY. To this GOOD adds: "It was customary equally among the Greeks and Orientals to wear crowns or garlands of different degrees of value, in proportion to the rank of the person presenting them, on festivals of every description; but those prepared for the celebration of a nuptial banquet as being a festivity of the first consequence, were of peculiar splendor and magnificence."] mostly διδυμοτόκοι, i. e., have two lambs at a time, is testified by recent travellers, e. g., the anonymous author of the publication, "Ægypten wie es jetzt ist," p. 42 (comp. MAGN. in loc.). L. DE LEON (in the same place as before) has again finely shown the sensible and striking character of the comparison here selected: "The figure almost paints the whole thing before our eyes. The flock of sheep, which always go crowded together like the scales of fir cones, represent the compactness and smallness of her teeth: their whiteness is expressed by their coming up from the washing; their uniformity by none being sick or barren."

† [WITHINGTON is alone in finding not Solomon's mother, but his mother-in-law, in this passage; he renders thus: "wearing the wreath which his (new rural) mother wove for him in the day of his espousals (to her daughter)."

* [PERCY gives the preposition a privative sense, and translates "now thy veil is removed." He supposes that the royal pair having alighted from their carriage, the ceremony of unveiling the bride here follows, which gives occasion to the bridegroom's encomium on those features which the veil in great measure concealed. But WILLIAMS observes that the "Eastern poets celebrate the charms of the fair through their veils, and improve this circumstance into an elegant compliment." AINSWORTH and others remark upon the circumstance that seven particulars are here mentioned in the description of the bride, viz.: her "eyes, hair, teeth, lips, temples, neck and breasts," uniting, as MOODY STUART expresses it, "perfection of number with perfection of beauty."—TR.]

† [GINSBURG adopts the translation of LOWTH, PERCY and FRY with advantage to the figure: "All of which are paired. That is, each upper tooth has its corresponding lower one;

Ver. 3. Like a crimson thread thy lips, and thy mouth is lovely.—The lips immediately follow the teeth, not simply because they cover them (HITZIG), but also because the bright red of the one forms an elegant contrast with the dazzling whiteness of the other; comp. the combination of the two colors in v. 10. Then the mouth, comprehending both teeth and lips, stands here in its quality of an organ of speech, whence also it is called מִדְבָּר from דָּבַר, "to speak," and is supplied with a predicate (נָאוֶה, lovely; comp. ii. 14; i. 15), which serves to characterize not so much its pretty shape or color as the agreeable and beneficent effects proceeding from it. The SEPT., VULG., SYR., HENGSTENB., etc., take מִדְבָּר as equivalent to speech; A. SCHULTENS and DÖPKE, to tongue; HITZIG, to palate. But like all that is described before and after, this expression must denote some part of the body, and one too that is externally visible, and which forms a substantial feature of Shulamith's beauty.—Like a piece of pomegranate thy cheek.—רַקָּה literally "the temple" (Judg. iv. 21; v. 26), here manifestly the upper part of the cheek, whose soft red borders upon the white of the temple. For this figure of the half of a pomegranate (פֶּלַח הָרִמּוֹן) refers to the pleasing combination of white and red; on one side of the exterior of this fruit "a bright red is mingled with yellow and white," whilst the other side looks brown (DÖPKE). It is only to a half, a segment * (פֶּלַח from פלח, "to cut fruit," 2 Kings iv. 39) of the pomegranate that the cheek is compared because its soft curve only corresponds in fact to the segment of a sphere. Not, therefore, "like a slice of a pomegranate" (LUTH.) [so DURELL, HODG., THRUPP], as though the flat inner surface of a sliced pomegranate were intended (HENGSTENB., HAHN., etc.). For the appearance of the reddish seeds of this fruit, lying in a yellowish pulp, would not form a suitable comparison, whether for a cheek or a temple.

Ver. 4. Like the tower of David thy neck, built for an armoury. His aim was not to describe the slender grace and erectness of Shulamith's neck in and of itself, but likewise with reference to its ornaments consisting of brilliant jewelry and ornamental chains (comp. i. 9-11) and consequently in respect to its superb and stately appearance (comp. vii. 5 [4]). A pecularly suitable comparison was accordingly offered to the king in the tower, hung around with burnished pieces of armor, and probably built of white free-stone, which David may have erected somewhere in the vicinity, perhaps at one corner of his palace on Zion as a bulwark or a watch tower.* The identity of this tower with the "tower of Lebanon which looks toward Damascus" mentioned in vii. 5 (4) is contradicted by the fact that the latter is a figure for an entirely different thing from that now before us (versus EWALD, HITZIG, etc.). Still less can the ivory tower spoken of in the very same passage be identical with this. This manifestly appears from the further defining clauses "built for an armory," etc., to have been a fortification, a stronghold for arms, a tower for warlike purposes, and hence, perhaps, is not distinct from the "house of the mighty" (בֵּית הַגִּבּוֹרִים) spoken of in Neh. iii. 16, which is assigned to the neighborhood of the district of Beth-zur and the sepulchres of David, i. e., on the eastern side of Zion, on the very spot where David's old palace must have stood (comp. WEISSBACH in loc.)—The difficult expression תַּלְפִּיּוֹת, which the LXX render as a proper name (Θαλφιώθ), the VULG. by propagnacula, AQ., and the Versio Veneta by ἐπάλξεις, is most correctly taken with KIMCHI for a compound of תֵּל collis (const. תַּל) and פִּיּוֹת enses, edges, sword-blades (Prov. v. 4; Judg. iii. 16; comp. Ps. cxlix. 6), or which amounts to the same thing, referred to תלה "to hang" and פִּיּוֹת in the same sense as before (HENGSTENB., DEL., WEISSB., etc.). In both cases it must designate a lofty object of the nature of a fortification, hung around with swords or bristling with swords, consequently, as mention is also made of shields in what follows, an armory which, as it served for the preservation of numerous martial weapons of offence and defence, was likewise hung around with them on the outside, and thus embellished. For the shields hung on it (עָלָיו) according to the next clause of the verse, and not barely in it (as HITZIG supposes, who fancies a "mound of earth," which "hides in its bosom such murderous weapons" as swords, shields, etc. This explanation is at any rate better suited to the connection and yields a more appropriate figure for Shulamith's neck decorated with brilliant ornaments than the derivation of תַּלְפִּיּוֹת from a substantive תַּלְפִּי, which, according to the Arab., would mean "host, army" (EWALD: "built for troops;" BÖTTCH., RÖDIG., compare HEILIGST.), or from an alleged adjective thus they, as it were, appear in pairs, like this flock of white sheep, each of which keeps to its mate, as they come up from the washing pool. And no one of them is deprived of its fellow, i. e., no tooth is deprived of its corresponding one, just as none of the sheep is bereaved of its companion. The teeth surely, which are here compared to the flock, cannot be said to bear twins like the sheep."]

* [CASTELLUS, followed by PATRICK, GOOD and others: the opening flower or blossom of the pomegranate. WILLIAMS: "If the bridal veil of the Hebrew ladies was like that of the Persians, made of red silk or muslin, it would throw a glow over the whole countenance that will account more fully for this comparison."]

* [GOOD: "The graceful neck of the fair bride is compared to this consummate structure; and the radiance of the jewels that surrounded it to the splendor of the arms and shields with which the tower of David was adorned. The simile is exquisite."]

תַּלְפִּי exitialis, destructive, hence תַּלְפִּיּוֹת exitialia, viz. arma, murderous weapons, or from לָבֵן=לפה to be white, hence "pieces of alabaster" (HAHN), and the like.*—All the shields of heroes. שְׁלָטִים has a wider meaning than מָגֵן, which specially denotes the "shield of a light armed soldier," the "target;" see GESEN. Thes., p. 1418. We are scarcely to think of the shields of conquered heroes, of those for instance which David (2 Sam. viii. 7) had taken from the Syrians (versus WEISSB.), because the mighty men here mentioned are simply referred to as the garrison of the armory here described. Comp., moreover, Ezek. xxvii. 11, a passage which is probably based on that before us.

Ver. 5. Thy two breasts like two fawns, twins of a gazelle, that are feeding among lilies. On c comp. ii. 16. The comparison is plainly intended to express "delicate and exquisite beauty" (HITZ.); for since the gazelle itself, when full grown, is an admirable, attractive and favorite emblem of womanly grace and loveliness (Prov. v. 19; comp. above on ii. 7, 9), a twin pair of its young lying on a bed covered with lilies appears to be still better fitted to illustrate the fragrant delicacy and elegance of a chaste virgin bosom veiled by the folds of a dress redolent of sweet odors (comp. i. 13). A more detailed parcelling out of the comparison (as for instance by HITZIG, who thinks that the dress was red, or by WEISSB., who supposes a particular reference in the young gazelles to the dark-colored nipples of her breasts as their especial charm, and in the lilies to the snowy whiteness of her bosom) is inadmissible, and leads to what is in violation of good taste or to what is obscene, from both which the poet has kept free here as every where else. Admirably here again LUIS DE LEON (p. 221, f.): "In addition to the delicacy of the young kids, in addition to their similarity as twins, in addition to their loveliness and gentleness they have in their merry gambols a frolicksomeness and gayety, which irresistibly enchains the eyes of beholders, and attracts them to come near and touch them," etc.

Ver. 6. Until the day cools and the shadows flee I will get me to the mountain of myrrh and to the hill of frankincense. If Solomon were still the speaker in these words, nothing else could possibly be meant by the mountain of myrrh and the hill of frankincense, but the breasts of the bride which would be so designated here in facetious and flowery style (EWALD, HEILIGST., WEISSB., REN., etc.,) with allusion to the fragrant substances, which were between them or upon them * (comp. i. 13). But the very circumstance, that then the foregoing figure for the bosom would here be followed by one entirely new and of a different description, whilst every other part of the body spoken of in this section is represented by but a single figure (see vers. 1–4) makes it improbable that the words before us belong to Solomon. To which may be added that עַד שֶׁיָּפוּחַ הַיּוֹם, etc., must belong to Shulamith here as well as in ii. 17; and that BÖTTCHER'S attempt to assign only these introductory words to the "vinedresser" as he calls her, and the latter part of the verse from אֵלֶךְ לִי onward to the king who interrupts her, seems scarcely less arbitrary than HITZIG'S view that the whole verse is spoken by the shepherd, who suddenly enters and declares his purpose to effect the speedy rescue of Shulamith! UMBR., DÖPKE, VAIH., DELITZSCH, etc., properly assign the words to Shulamith, who seeks thus to parry the ardent encomiums of Solomon, and hence expresses the wish to leave the wedding hall resounding with the boisterous festivities of the guests until the approach of evening. The "mountain of myrrh" and the "hill of frankincense," which she wishes to visit for this end, were probably certain localities about the royal palace, near the hall and visible from it, which either always bore those names or only on the occasion of the present marriage, to which fumigations with various spices belonged as an absolutely indispensable ingredient, comp. iii. 6. As presumably solitary, shady spots, belonging, it may be, to grounds laid out as gardens (perhaps "beds of balsam" of the sort mentioned in v. 13, raised in the shape of pyramids or towers), these must have been to the simple-minded, guileless child of nature more desirable places to stay in than the noisy festive hall. Comp. her similar expressions of a strong desire for the fresh solitude of nature in opposition to the luxurious life of the court; i. 7, 16, and especially vii. 12 (11) ff. This understanding of the "mountain of myrrh," etc., is evidently far less forced than explaining it of Lebanon, or generally of the region of Shulamith's home, for which she here expresses her desire (UMBREIT, VAIH.), or of "Sion as the seat of the court" (HITZIG), or of Zion as a figure of the church (HENGSTENB.), or of Moriah as the Temple-mountain which is here designated הַר הַמּוֹר (IBN EZRA, JARCHI). Comp. on v. 18 and vi. 2.

* ["Our first business is here with the controverted word לְתַלְפִּיּוֹת, our translation of which "with projecting parapets," is in partial accordance with, and derives support from that of SYMMACHUS, εἰς ἐπάλξεις (al. ἐπάνω ἐπάλξεων). The word תלפיות, or rather its singular תלפיה [better תלפית] is regularly derived from the root לפה. That root is, according to BUXTORF, actually found in the Chaldee in the Targum of JONATHAN on Lev. vi. 5; although in the Targum, as printed by WALTON, we read not ילפי but יוסף. However, whether the root be used or no, its meaning may be assumed to be identical with that of לפף, which is found in other places in the Targum of ONKELOS. The meaning is "to add on," "to join on." The substantive derived from it, when applied to a building, would thus naturally denote the projecting parts of the building, which seem as it were to be added on to the rest. We have an analogous term in the Chaldee לופין, derived from the same root as תלפיות, and used in the Talmud of strongly marked eyebrows. The projecting parapets of a tower are in fact its eyebrows. And that ancient towers were built with such projecting parapets, and moreover that shields were hung by way of display on the exterior of the parapets, is established in the most satisfactory manner by a representation on a bas-relief at Kouyounjik, given by LAYARD, and also in SMITH'S Dict. of the bible, s. v. Gammadims. Of the current explanations of תלפיות, the only one which seems to call for notice, is that which derives it from תלה "to hang," פיות "edges," and makes it mean "an armory." Against this lie the objections, 1st that it unnecessarily treats תלפיות as a composite word; 2d, that an armory would be more naturally described as a "hang-weapons" than a "hang-edges;" 3d, that the figure before us is not that of an armory, but of a building with shields hung on its exterior; 4th, that any etymological connection between the words תלפיות and תלוי in the two adjoining clauses is improbable, as it would destroy the charm of the studied homœophony. There are two other passages of Scripture in which we may trace some allusion to this tower, Mic. iv. 8; Isa. v. 2." THRUPP.]

* [NOYES thinks that the bride herself, in respect to her general charms, is here compared to a mountain of myrrh, etc., to whom the lover says he will return as the antelope flies to the mountain.]

4. CONTINUATION: vers. 7–11.

Ver. 7. Thou art all fair, my dear, and there is not a blemish in thee. Correctly DELITZSCH: "This childlike disposition expressed ver. 6, makes her but the more lovely in the eyes of the king; he breaks out in the words, 'thou art all fair, my dear,' etc., undoubtedly meaning that the beauty of her soul corresponds with her outward beauty—not with reference, therefore, to the charms of her bodily figure from her breast downward, which are more fully described subsequently vii. 2 ff." (WEISSE.)—On the form of expression, particularly in b, comp. 2 Sam. xiv. 25; Eph. v. 27.

Ver. 8. With me from Lebanon, my bride, with me from Lebanon thou shalt come. Several of the advocates of the shepherd-hypothesis assume at these words a change of person and with it likewise a change of scene, either making the shepherd himself enter and speak all that follows to ver. 16 (so BÖTTCHER, REN.), or at least to ver. 8 (so HITZIG), or regarding all from this verse to v. 8 as a monologue of Shulamith, who herein relates the words previously spoken to her by her country lover (so EWALD, who accordingly imagines that the words: "Lo, here comes my lover, and says to me," or the like, have been dropped out before this verse). But an unprejudiced interpretation renders such artifices needless. Led by the wish of his beloved, expressed in ver. 6, to exchange her place amongst the jubilant guests for the quiet solitude of nature, Solomon recalls her descent from a simple shepherd's family in the mountain region of Northern Palestine, and hence he exultingly and in exaggerated expressions announces to her how instead of living in sterile mountain districts, and on barren rocky heights rendered insecure by wild beasts, she should henceforth make her home with him in the royal palace, and in the midst of its rich joys and blissful beauties, herself its loveliest flower, the most charming and spicy of its gardens (see especially vers. 12–15). The enthusiastic lover does not consider that in this he says nothing that is really agreeable to her, but actually contravenes her longing to escape into the open country from the close and sultry atmosphere of court life, any more than he concerns himself about the exaggerated character of his comparisons, e. g. of the mountains around Shunem with Lebanon, or of the "little foxes" in Shulamith's vineyards (ii. 15) with lions and panthers. Poetical exaggerations of this sort are besides quite accordant with his taste (comp. ver. 4 and especially vii. 5), and appear much less strange in him than the bold comparison of Zion or of Solomon's palace with the heights of Lebanon and Hermon (according to HITZIG, BÖTTCH., RENAN, etc.,) would sound in the mouth of a simple shepherd.—Besides תָּבוֹאִי "thou shalt come" shows that the speaker had a definite term in mind, to which Shulamith was to come from "Lebanon" as her previous residence (comp. HITZIG in loc.), and that consequently the idea of going up and down from one peak of Lebanon to another (DELITZSCH) is not found in the passage.*—Shalt journey from the top of Amana. The "summit" or the "top" of Amana is without doubt the mountain by the river Amana mentioned 2 Kin. v. 12 K'ri, that is to say that peak of the Lebanon or more accurately the Antilibanus-range, in which this river Amana, the Chrysorrhoas of the Greeks or the Barada of the Arabs takes its rise. This peak, like the following Shenir and Hermon, stands of course by poetic license for the entire range. For the poet cannot have intended a contrast between the Lebanon in a and these names of mountains that follow, but "he only varies the names because one meant the same to him as another" (so correctly HITZIG, versus DELITZSCH, HENGSTENB., etc.).—From the top of Shenir and Hermon. According to Deut. iii. 9 Shenir was the Amoritish name for Hermon itself, which thereby appears to be designated as the "snow mountain" (according to JARCHI on that passage and the TARGUM on this). Still it is shown as well by the passage before us as by Ezek. xxvii. 5, 1 Chron. v. 23, that a distinction was commonly made between Shenir which lay further to the north and Hermon (now Jebel esh-Sheikh) the more southern of the principal peaks in the entire Hermon or Antilibanus range (comp. ROBINSON, Palest. II. p. 440 (edit. 1838), BERTH. on 1 Chron. v. 23). As now Amana, where the Chrysorrhoas has its source, must be the peak lying farthest to the east or north-east, the enumeration of the three peaks or ridges belonging to Antilibanus evidently proceeds from the north-east to the south-west, or from the region of Baalbec to that of Hasbeya and Paneas (comp. HITZIG in loc.).—From dens of lions, from mountains of panthers. These expressions as belonging to the description and only alluding in a general way to the wild and inhospitable character of the region about Shulamith's home, are not to be pressed for the sake of obtaining any more special sense, particularly not so as with KÖSTER, BÖTTCHER, HITZIG, etc. to explain the lions of "the king of Israel and his magnates who have dragged the graceful roe Shulamith into his den!" Lions moreover must have had their haunts in the forests of Lebanon, as well as in the reeds on the banks of the Jordan (Zech. xi. 3; Jer. xii. 5) and on Bashan (Deut. xxxiii. 22). And panthers (this is the meaning of נְמֵרִים, not leopards, which as is known, are only found in Africa) are still found in the region of Lebanon according to modern travellers. (BURCKHARDT, Reisen in Syrien, pp. 99, 66).

* [This interpretation certainly assumes such extraordinary exaggerations as to cast suspicion upon its correctness. NOYES says: "Verses 8 and 9 seem to be introduced very abruptly, and their import in this connection is not very obvious. DÖDERLEIN and others suppose them to be an invitation to the bride to take an excursion with him, in order that they might admire together all that was grand and beautiful in scenery. Others suppose them to be an invitation to the maiden to come from a place of danger to a place of complete security in the arms of her lover." GOOD: "By this forcible appeal the royal speaker invites his beloved to his arms as to a place of safety; and encourages her to look towards him for security amidst any dangers, either actual or imaginary, of which she might be apprehensive." BURROWES: "These mountains thus beautiful but dangerous are put in contrast with the mountain of myrrh and the hill of frankincense. The beloved would have his spouse leave the former and seek his society in the retreats of the latter." The majority of English commentators adopt a similar view, though with some variety in the figurative or symbolic sense which they put upon the mountains in question.—TR.]

Ver. 9. Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my bride. This double designation of his beloved as sister and as bride is neither meant to indicate a peculiarly intimate nor pre-eminently chaste and pure relation of love. The thing here intended by it is the designation of a certain relationship. As Solomon's lawful wife Shulamith now, after the marriage has taken place, stands next to him as a sister to her brother.* She is not barely one of a number of wives (vi. 8) but a sisterly sharer of his royal rank and name. She is queen, as he is king, yes, a "prince's daughter," vii. 2, as he is a prince's son (correctly HITZIG and WEISSB.).—לִבַּבְתִּנִי not "thou robbest me of courage" (UMBR., MAGN.), nor "thou hast given me courage" (SYMM., SYR., EWALD, DÖPKE, BÖTTCHER, MEIER, WEISSB., etc.), but "thou hast unhearted me" (DELITZSCH) i. e. "robbed me of my heart, so that it is no more mine but thine," hast "enchanted me and made me wholly thine own."†—With one of thy glances; literally "with one from thy eyes," i. e. with a single one of the glances that proceed from them (HENGSTENB., HITZIG, etc.); for the masc. בְּאַחַד of the K'thibh, which is certainly to be retained, cannot refer to one of the two eyes (עַיִן is never masc.), but only to one thing which comes forth from the eyes, an effect proceeding from them.‡—With one chain of thy necklace. The representation is ideal and hyperbolical as in the preceding verse. It proceeds in rapturous exaggerations as well here where it paints in detail, as before where it dealt in pompous and grandiloquent expressions. But to be sure, in the matter of love, it always remains true: small causes often produce great effects!—עֲנָק not "ringlet, lock of the front hair hanging down on the neck" (HITZIG), but neckchain, or ornament (comp. the plur.: Prov. i. 9; Judg. viii. 16). צַוְּרֹנִים, since it is plural, can neither mean "neck" (SEPT., VULG., HITZIG, etc.) nor be a diminutive of endearment, "tiny neck" (GESENIUS, EWALD, HEILIGST., etc.). It must rather denote something suspended about the neck, a necklace or jewelry for the neck,* and עֲנָק a single piece or constituent of it. What had enchanted the king was of course not the elegance or ingenious workmanship of this ornament itself, but that Shulamith's neck looked so charmingly in it. Comp. above on i. 10.

Ver. 10. How fair is thy love, my sister, my bride. דּוֹדִים here again, not "breasts" (SEPT., VULG., LUTHER), but "caresses, manifestations of love," as i. 2. Comp. generally i. 2, 3. Solomon here gives back to his beloved with larger measure, what she had there declared of him when absent.

Ver. 11. Liquid honey thy lips distil, my bride; honey and milk are under thy tongue. As in the preceding verse, which like the present consists of three clauses, the first two members refer to one and the same subject, so these two clauses aim to depict but one attribute or one characteristic of Shulamith, viz., her lovely discourse, how sweetly she talked. For it is to this that the figures of lips and tongue point, comp. on the one hand Prov. v. 3; vi. 24; vii. 5; xvi. 24; and on the other Ps. lv. 22; lxvi. 17; x. 7; PINDAR, Nem. iii. 134; THEOCRIT. Id. viii. 82 ff.; xx. 26 ff. The fragrant spittle of the kissing mouth can scarcely be intended (vs. DÖPKE, MAGN., WEISSB.), in spite of Arabic and classic parallels, that might be adduced (the saliva oris osculantis HORAT. Od. I. 13, 16; CATULL. 99, 2, etc.). For the parallels ii. 14, v. 13, 16, likewise refer to the loveliness of discourse, not to the sweetness of kisses.—And the fragrance of thy garments is like the fragrance of Lebanon. As is shown by the parallel, Hos. xiv. 7, the Lebanon of this passage is not to be converted into לְבוֹנָה "frankincense" as DÖPKE imagines, on account of the "sicut odor thuris" of the VULG. (which probably arose from misunderstanding the ὡς ὀσμὴ Λιβανοῦ of the SEPT.). Modern travellers testify (SCHULZ. Leit. d. Allerh., Th. V. p. 459; ZELLER, Bibl. Wörterbuch für d. Christl. Volk II. p. 42) that the cedar groves of Lebanon diffuse a strong balsamic odor. Isaac also commends the scent of his son Esau's garments (Gen. xxvii. 27); and so Ps. xlv. 9 praises the garments of a king celebrating his marriage, which were perfumed with myrrh, aloes and cassia.

5. CONTINUATION. Vers. 12–15.

Ver. 12. A garden locked is my sister, my bride; a spring locked, a fountain sealed. If instead of גַּל in b we were with about 50 Heb. Mss. of KENNICOTT, the SEPT., VULG., SYR., etc.,† to read

* [PATRICK: "Sister is only a word of tenderness and endearment used by husbands to their wives; as appears by the book of Tobit vii. 16; viii. 4, 7." NOYES, with less cogency, compares Tibul. iii. 1, 26. THRUPP is consequently not warranted in saying: "The union of the two appellations is of itself an almost decisive objection against all literal interpretation of the Song. When it is urged by the literalists that the term sister is merely used as an expression of endearment, it may be at once replied that that is the very last term which in chaste love a bridegroom would ever think of applying to his bride."]

† [WORDSWORTH obtains substantially the same sense by a rendering precisely the opposite: "Lit.: Thou hast behearted me. It implies the answering of heart to heart; the passing of one heart into another, so as to be united with it and fill it."]

‡ (WILLIAMS, who remarks that "the K'ri and many MSS. read אחת fem. to agree with עַיִן," endeavors to account for the singularity of the expression so understood in the following manner: "Supposing the royal bridegroom to have had a profile or side view of his bride in the present instance, only one eye or one side of her necklace would be observable; yet this charms and overpowers him. TERTULLIAN mentions a custom in the East of women unveiling only one eye in conversation, while they keep the other covered; and NIEBUHR mentions a like custom in some parts of Arabia. Trav. in Arab. I. p. 262."]

† [So THRUPP: The received Hebrew text here gives not גַּן but גַּל which our E. V. renders "a spring." But the word never occurs elsewhere in this sense; nor is it indeed, in the singular, applied to aught but a heap of stones.]

גַּן again, the comparison with the garden, being immediately repeated, would appear to be the main and prominent thought. But it is evidently more suitable that the figure of the spring, which is not carried out any further in what immediately follows, should be twice repeated, in order that it may not be too abrupt. The change of the unusual גַּל (which means spring, fountain, as appears from Josh. xv. 19; Judg. i. 15; comp. English well, of which the German "Wellen" (waves) is the plural) into גַּן, which had been used just before, would also be easier to explain, than a conversion of the latter into the former expression. The garden and the spring being locked up and sealed, naturally indicates that the access is open only to the owner and possessor himself. Comp. ver. 16, where Shulamith designates her hidden charms first as her own garden, then as Solomon's; also Prov. v. 15–18, where the figure of a spring is likewise applied to the natural relation between a wife and her wedded lord, so that she is represented by a fountain absolutely inaccessible to all men except her husband, and the right of the latter freely to enjoy and to refresh himself with the waters of this spring is clearly presupposed.* A previous coyness of Shulamith toward her lover (HITZIG, VAIH., etc.) is not at all the thing intended.

Vers. 13, 14. A more minute description of the garden, i. e., of the charms of Shulamith, in so far as they may be represented by the choice plants and delicious fruits of a pleasure garden, accessible only to the king; an expansion therefore of 12 a (as 12 b is more fully unfolded in ver. 15). Thy plants are an orchard of pomegranates. שֶׁלַח means here as in Ex. xxxi. 5, not a plantation (HENGSTENB.), but a single plant, literally a shoot, sprout (comp. שֶׁלַח Ps. lxxx. 12; Jer. xvii. 8; Ezek. xvii. 6, 7). By this figurative expression are denoted the charms, the ravishing beauties of the beloved in general, not specially her limbs (HITZIG), or the fragrance of her unguents (WEISSB.). A particular explanation of the individual products of the garden is, on the whole, impossible, and it leads to what is at variance with good taste. רִמּוֹנִים pomegranates, i. e., the trees, not their fruit (DÖPKE, EWALD, WEISSB.); for the fruit is mentioned afterwards.—On the different opinions respecting the etymology of פַּרְדֵּס, comp. the Introduction, § 8 Rem. 2.—With most excellent fruit; lit., "with fruit of excellencies" (מְגָדִים as vii. 14). The fruit of the pomegranate trees before mentioned may very well be intended; עִם with does not necessarily, as is shown by i. 11, introduce something entirely new and of a different sort (vs. WEISSB.)—Cyprus flowers with nards. As already remarked on i. 12, 14, the cyprus flower or alhenna was the only one of these plants, which was also cultivated in Palestine. The nard grass, grown only in India, is therefore simply added here for the sake of the delightfully fragrant unguent obtained from it, as in the following verse incense, calamus, cinnamon, and probably also saffron are exotic plants known to the Hebrews only from their aromatic products. The description accordingly loses itself here again in rapturous exaggerations and improbabilities in natural history, which however at the same time bear witness to an extensive knowledge of nature (comp. Introduc. § 8, Rem. 1).—Nard and crocus, calamus and cinnamon. כַּרְכֹּם, CHALD. כּוּרְכְּמָא, SEPT. κρόκος (comp. Sanskrit, kunkuma) is the saffron flower, (Crocus sativus) indigenous in India, but introduced also into Egypt and Asia Minor, and consequently perhaps also into Palestine. A water was prepared from it for smelling bottles, with a pungent but agreeable odor, which was a great favorite in antiquity; comp. WINER R. W. B. Art. "Safran."—קָנֶה, SEPT. κάλαμος, is, according to Jer. vi. 20; Isa. xliii. 24; Ezek. xxvii. 19, an article of trade brought from Arabia Felix, sweet cane, calamus. The calamus (juncus odoratus, PLIN. XII. 22; XXI. 18) which according to THEOPHRASTUS, PLINY and STRABO, grew in Coelesyria and by the lake of Gennesaret, was of an inferior and less valuable sort.—קִנָּמוֹן a Semitic name, as it would appear (lit. "the reed," or the "rolled together," from קָנָה—קָנַם), in case it is not of Indian origin, and connected with the Malay kainamanis (so RÖDIGER, Additamenta ad Thesaur., p. 111) signifies cinnamon, which, according to HERODOT. III. 111 came through Arabia from the remotest south, that is, probably from Ceylon.—With every variety of incense woods, i. e., with every species of wood, which yields a fragrant gum of the nature of frankincense, or when pulverized is used as "aromatic dust," or as a powder to be sprinkled for fumigation. In opposition to the reading עֲצֵי לְבָנוֹן (SEPT., VELTH., DÖPKE), see HITZIG in loc.—Myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices. For myrrh comp. on i. 13; and for aloes (אֲהָלוֹת or אֲהָלִים, as Prov. vii. 17.; Num. xxiv. 6; GR. ἀγάλλοχον, Sanskr. aguru, aghil) see WINER, R. W. B.—Under "all the chief (lit., all heads of) aromatic plants," balsams or spices (בְּשָׂמִים a general expression, as in Ex. xxx. 23; Esth. ii. 12), in addition to the substances already named, cassia is especially to be regarded as included. For according to Ex. xxx. 23 ff., this particular aromatic product was mingled with myrrh, calamus and cinnamon, in the holy anointing oil, and in Ps. xlv. 9 (8) it appears with myrrh and aloes among the precious spices, with which the garments of the royal bridegroom were perfumed.

* [FRY imagines that this and the following verses do not "contain comparisons of the bride, but are descriptive of the residence prepared for her reception." He translates: "A garden is enclosed, my sister espoused," etc. MAUNDRELL, in his Journey says: "About the distance of one hundred and forty paces from these pools [i. e. of Solomon] is the fountain from which they principally derive their waters. This the friars told us was the sealed fountain, to which the holy spouse is compared, Cant. iv. 12. And they pretend a tradition that King Solomon shut up these springs, and kept the door of them sealed with his signet, to preserve the waters for his own drinking in their natural freshness and purity. Nor was it difficult thus to secure them, they rising under ground, and having no avenue to them but a little hole like the mouth of a narrow well. These waters wind along through two rooms cut out of the solid rock, which are arched over with stone arches, very ancient, perhaps the work of Solomon himself. Below the pool runs down a narrow, rocky valley, inclosed on both sides with high mountains; this, they told us, was the enclosed garden alluded to in the same Song."]

Ver. 15. Further expansion of ver. 12 b.—A garden spring (art thou), a well of living water. Comp. Gen. xxvi. 19; Jér. ii. 13. By the "garden spring" (lit. spring of gardens) HITZIG understands the fountain of Siloah in particular—an assumption which is the more gratuitous, as the allusion to שֶׁלַח which he finds in שְׁלָחַיִם ver. 13, exists merely in the fancy of the overacute modern critic, in spite of Neh. iii. 15; Isa. viii. 6; Eccles. ii. 6, etc.—And streams from Lebanon, i. e., water as fresh and delightfully refreshing as the gushing streams fed by the snows of Lebanon, Jer. xviii. 14. On the figure comp. besides Prov. v. 15, the Phenician inscription of Kition (No. 2) adduced by HITZIG, in which a husband calls his deceased wife מקבחי, i. e., מַקְּבַּ חַיַּי, "the spring of my life."

6. THE COMPLETE UNION OF THE LOVERS, ver. 16, v. 1.—IBN EZRA, followed by EWALD and DELITZSCH, correctly puts the whole of ver. 16 into the mouth of Shulamith. The contrast of גַּנִּי my garden in a with לְגַנּוֹ his garden in b does not make in favor of two speakers, but simply brings out the thought that her garden is his, and therefore that she, with all she has and is, belongs to him; a delicately refined suggestion which is lost by dividing the verse between the lover and his beloved, as approved in recent times (DÖPKE, MAGN., BÖTTCH., HITZ., REN., etc.).

Ver. 16. Awake, north wind, and come, O south. Shulamith in her poetically excited frame summons just these two winds to blow upon her garden, because neither the east wind with its parching effects and its frequent storms (Gen. xli. 6; Isa. xxvii. 8), nor the rainy west wind (1 Kin. xviii. 44 f; Luke xii. 54) would be suitable in the connection; and yet two opposite winds must be named, as it is not a blowing off or blowing away that is intended, but causing the odors to flow forth and wafting them in all directions.* That its spices may flow, i. e., that every thing in me, which pleases my lover, all my charms may show themselves to him in their full power and loveliness.—Let my beloved come to his garden, and eat his excellent fruits. The language here becomes plainer, and passes over into a solicitation to her lover to enjoy to the full her charms which he had been praising (for אָכַל "to eat" in this comp. Prov. xxx. 20.) Yet she expresses this wish not by a direct address to him, but by speaking of him in the third person—a token of her chaste, modest and bashful mind.—Chap. v. 1. I come to my garden, my sister, my bride. That Solomon is here the speaker, whilst full of rapture he sets himself to comply with his beloved's invitation and to devote himself entirely to her loving embrace incontestably appears from the correspondence of בָּאתִי with יָבֹא in b of the preceding verse, and of אָכַלְתִּי here with וְיֹאכַל there. These verbs, as well as אָרִיתִי (=לָקַטְתִּי "I pluck," Ex. xvi. 16) and שָׁתִיתִי are not to be taken as preterites: "I have come," etc., (DEL., as the SEPT., VULG., LUTHER, etc.,) because the acme of love's enjoyment, to which both are tending, was by no means reached and exhausted by a single conjugal embrace, but strictly as present, as serving to state that which is in the very act of being performed.* Comp. דִּמִּיתִיךְ; i. 9, and numerous examples in EWALD, Lehrb., § 135 c, [GREEN'S Heb. Gram., § 262, 2.]—I pluck my myrrh . . . . . I eat my honey . . . . . I drink my wine. A threefold declaration in different forms of his immediate readiness to enjoy the charms of his beloved, with a partial return to the figures in iv. 10, 11, 13.†—Eat friends, drink and drink to repletion, O beloved. Every other understanding of these closing verses seems inappropriate and forced but that already suggested, according to which they are an encouraging address of the bridegroom to the wedding guests, who remain behind at the table. Thus, e. g., that of EWALD, that Shulamith describes in these words the way in which her distant lover, if she were with him and were celebrating her marriage with him, would remember his friends; the strange and burlesque idea of BÖTTCHER referred to above, p. 72; that, too, of EICHHORN, MAGNUS, HITZIG: that the words are an exhortation of the poet to the two lovers to enjoy their love and intoxicate themselves therewith; and the like views of others, according to which Solomon either encourages his beloved (UMBR., HENGSTENB., HAHN) or she him (WEISSB.) to the enjoyment of love. These latter views are based upon an untenable translation of דּוֹדִים by "love" as though it were the object of וְשִׁכְרוּ ("intoxicate yourselves with love") for דּוֹדִים with the scriptio plena is plur. of דּוֹד "beloved" (comp. on i. 2), and consequently Prov. vii. 18 (where it is דֹּדִים "caresses" with the scriptio defectiva) cannot decide for the present case. The SEPT., VULG., LUTHER, DÖPKE, VAIH., DEL., are substantially correct, the last of whom adds the just remark in explanation: "For each (of the guests) was to have his share in tasting the joy of this day."

* [BURROWES: "The east wind is, in Palestine, generally withering and tempestuous; the west wind brings from the sea clouds of rain, or dark, damp air; the north wind is cooling and refreshing, its power being broken by the mountain chain of Lebanon; the south wind, though hot, has its heat mitigated in the upland regions, and is never stormy. The north wind is called on to "arise," because it is more powerful and strong; the south wind to "come," as though it were the soft breathing zephyr. The north wind brought clear weather; the south wind was warm and moist. The bride here calls for the north wind, that thereby all clouds may be swept away and the sky cleared; and for the south wind that its genial influence might ripen the fruits of the garden and draw forth the fragrance of the flowers."]

* [There is no reference in the language here employed to any thing low and sensual, but to pure and elevated enjoyment in the society and converse of his charming bride. The passage is thus appropriately paraphrased by TAYLOR: "I already enjoy the pleasure of your company and conversation; these are as grateful to my mind as delicious food could be to my palate: I could not drink wine and milk with greater satisfaction." He also gives a like figurative turn to the last clause: "And you, my friends, partake the relish of those pleasures which you hear from the lips of my beloved, and of those elegancies which you behold in her deportment and address."—TR.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. That the action of the Canticles reaches its centre and acme in this act, and especially at the close of it, cannot be doubted upon an unprejudiced view of the whole. "The newly wedded bride is now in the arms of her husband and king. Their ardent mutual love is the joyous spectacle presented to a festive assembly, which is attached to the king by friendship and love. Every where the feeling suited to a wedding, enjoyment, and this enjoyment shared by loving sympathy. Arrived at the summit of love's mystery and moving there with holy purity the song here dies away amid the revelry of the guests." (DEL., p. 115.)

2. The recognition of the central and superior significance of this section is of necessity precluded upon the allegorical interpretation, because it fails to perceive the organic progress of the action in general, and supposes the union of the two lovers to have become complete long before this, (comp. above. p. 56) so as neither to require nor admit of increase. This unio mystica, this perfect union of Christ with His church or with the individual soul it consequently finds not at the conclusion merely, but already indicated at the very beginning of the present act in the "bed of Solomon," iii. 7, by which it is true many allegorists understand every different sort of thing, (e.g., IBN EZRA, the land of Israel; the TARG. and in recent times again JO. LANGE, the temple; SANCTIUS, prayer; THEODORET, the Holy Scriptures; APONIUS, the cross of Christ; and OSIANDER, the free exercise of religion even!) But the majority find represented in it the communion of believers with Christ at the acme of its perfection, whether their particular explanation points to Christ Himself (AMBROSE), or they find symbolized in it the heart of the Christian believer in conformity with Eph. iii. 17 (COCCEI., etc.,) or the free access of believers to the throne of grace in this world and the next (JOH. MARCK.), or "the church militant on earth, in which many children are born to the Lord" (STARKE after many of the older writers, as GREGORY the Great, CASSIODOR., BEDA, CALOV., HEUNISCH, etc.), or "the intimate relation between the heavenly Solomon and the church" (HENGST.), or the "kingdom administered by Solomon, so far as its power is directed ad extra" (HAHN). In the case of the sedan or magnificent couch (אפריון iii. 9) this divergence of interpretations is repeated with a prevailing disposition to refer it to the unio mystica. For besides the holy of holies in the temple (TARG.), or the word of God (MERCER.), or the church (ZELTN.), or the human nature of Christ (AMBROS., ATHANAS., GREG., BEDA, ANSELM, JO. LANGE), it is particularly the work of redemption with the gracious results proceeding from it (SANCTIUS; similarly COCCEIUS, GROENEWEGEN, STARKE, etc.,) or as expressed by HENGSTENBERG: "the glory of those measures by which the heavenly Solomon brings the Gentile nations into His kingdom," that is supposed to be intended by this figure of the sedan.* It is the same with iii. 11, where the "day of Solomon's marriage" according to STARKE signifies three things: 1. The day of salvation, when a sinner yields to converting grace, and is united to Christ by faith; 2. The day of the resurrection of the just, when Christ will make them partakers of the blessedness of the world to come. 3. The time when the Jewish people, who have long rejected Him shall crown Him in faith and publicly acknowledge Him as their bridegroom—an explanation with which most of the older and the later writers (even HENGSTENB., HAHN, etc.,) substantially agree, especially in so far that nearly all of them understand by the mother of Solomon the church of the Old Testament or the people of Israel, and by the crown with which she adorns her son the entire body of converted souls, which are an ornament and an honor to the Messiah,* comp. Phil. iv. 1; 1 Thes. ii. 19, etc.

This method of putting every possible interpretation upon every particular thing, and thus attaining an extravagant exuberance of multifarious significations, is also followed, of course, by the allegorists in the enthusiastic description of the beauty of the bride in iv. 1 ff. The hair of Shulamith compared with the flock of goats is made to signify either the entire body of believers or the weak and despised members of the church, or on the contrary, those who strive after a higher measure of perfection, the prelates of the church who have a keen eye like the goats, seek their food on the summits, eat what is green and chew the cud, and have parted hoofs and horns, wherewith to fight the heretics! The teeth of the beloved are prelates who feed upon the Scriptures, or teachers who attack the heretics; the lips either the preachers of God's word or confessions of faith of the church; the neck the Holy Scriptures or the steadfastness and assured hope of believers; the breasts compared with twin roes either the law and the gospel, or the Old and New Testament, or the Jews and Gentiles, or the eastern and western church, or baptism and the Lord's Supper as the two sacraments of the

* [WEISS expounds it of the holy of holies in Solomon's temple; the GENEVA version of "The temple which Solomon made;" THRUPP and WORDSWORTH, of the cross of Christ: The WESTMINSTER ANNOTATIONS, MOODY STUART and B. M. SMITH, of the person of Christ; ADELAIDE NEWTON, of the church; AINSWORTH, of Christ and His church; SCOTT, the everlasting covenant which Christ has meditated in our behalf; PATRICK, the preaching of the gospel by which the church is carried triumphantly through the world; WILLIAMS, the gospel in its onward progress; FRY and BURROWES, that conveyance, or those methods of divine grace by which the believer is carried onward toward heaven; GILL and HENRY, hesitate between the human nature of Christ, the church, the gospel, and the plan of salvation. BURROWES says: "It seems no part of the mind of the Spirit that we should take this description to pieces and try to allegorize the several parts." THRUPP also conveniently declines to carry the allegory through in all its details; "It is not necessary to suppose that any significance is intended in the assignment of separate materials to particular parts of the vehicle." SCOTT, however, is ready with distinct meanings for the "pillars of silver," the "bottom of gold," and the "covering of purple." And THRUPP himself insists that every separate feature of the bride in iv. 1–7 "must have its own distinct allegorical import. The comparisons would be as extravagant on the allegorical as on the literal interpretation, if the former were not to be carried out into details; and in fact that interpretation is virtually literal which refuses to see any allegory except in the general words 'Thou art fair.'"]

* Besides this prevalent form of the spiritual interpretation of iii. 11 there are various others of a more trifling character, especially among the older exegetes of whom, e. g., BEDA and ANSELM expound the wedding day of Christ's conception and birth; HONORIUS V. AUTUN and BERNARD of the death and resurrection of the Lord (and then the "crown" naturally church!* The locking up of the garden iv. 12 ff. denotes the strong protection with which God surrounds His church as with a wall of fire; the sealing is the gracious operations of the Holy Spirit on the church to enlighten and preserve it, Eph. iv. 30. The blowing of the north and south wind, iv. 16 also signifies the Holy Spirit in the varied operations of His grace, purifying, quickening, comforting, rendering fruitful, etc.; and the "coming of the bridegroom into his garden" (v. 1) according to the chronological expositors denotes the dawn of some new epoch in church history, e. g., according to COCCEIUS the times immediately succeeding CONSTANTINE the Great; according to HEUNISCH the ante-reformation period from the time of the great Schism (1378); according to CORN. A LAPIDE the incipient old age of the church, etc., but according to the greater number the particular times when Christ enters with the heavenly blessings of His grace into the hearts of believers (Rev. iii. 20; John xiv. 23), or the threefold advent of the Redeemer: 1. In the form of a servant to found His church. 2. His invisible coming by His Holy Spirit to every individual of His people. 3. His eschatological coming at the judgment and the consummation. Compare generally the multitude of old interpretations of this sort collected by STARKE on this section; also WILKENS, FRAY LUIS DE LEON, p. 207, 215, and DURSCH, Symbolik der Christlichen Religion, Vol. II. (Tübing., 1859),) passim.

3. Against such excesses and capricious trifling there is no protection but in that historical exegesis, which on the basis of the meaning of the words impartially ascertained endeavors, it is true, to point out the relations in which this action stands to the mysteries of revelation and redemption, and so to make application of its contents to the matters of the Christian life, but conscientiously refrains from all seeking or chasing after any direct spiritual and practical interpretation of individual passages, much less of individual words. To such an exegesis there appear to be chiefly three particulars of especial consequence in that stage of the action which is represented in this act: the elevation of the bride from a low condition to royal dignity and glory; her wondrous beauty as the ground of this elevation; and her chaste and humble mind which impels her to belong only to her lover and to live for him alone.

a. The simple country maiden from the tribe of Issachar is raised to be queen of all Israel, conducted in Solomon's stately couch with a brilliant military escort, welcomed by the women of Jerusalem with pride and admiration, brought for her marriage to his splendid palace in Zion by Solomon, the most famous prince of his time. Here full of rapture he declares to her that he loves and admires her more than all beside, that she has completely won and captivated him, so that his heart belongs to her alone, and that she is henceforth to exchange her humble surroundings and her country home for his royal palace and its rich enjoyments and brilliant pleasures (see especially iv. 8, 9). In like manner Christ, who is a greater than Solomon, who is King of all kings, and Lord of all lords, has exalted His church from misery and a low estate to a participation in His divine glory; He has made the despised and forsaken "His sister and bride," a joint-heir of His eternal glory in heaven, has received her into His kingdom, into His heavenly Father's house and there prepared a place for her, which she shall never be willing to exchange for her former abode in a remote and foreign land, in the wilderness of a sinful, earthly life. For the infinite superiority of that exaltation which the church of the Lord has experienced above that of Shulamith, and which every penitent and believing soul in it still experiences day by day, is shown in this that the shepherd girl from northern Palestine might with good reason look wistfully back to her poverty from Solomon's palace, that her desire to return from the sultry life of the court to the fresh cool mountain air of her home was but too well justified, whilst the soul which has been translated out of the wretchedness of a sinful worldly life into the blessed communion of God's grace, has no occasion nor right to be dissatisfied with its new home, but on the contrary has gained unmingled joy, delight and imperishable glory instead of its former condition of unhappy bondage and darkness.

b. The cause of Shulamith's elevation to be queen of her people lay in her wonderful beauty, which throws the king into such an ecstasy that he analyzes it with the utmost detail in order that he may adduce the finest objects of nature, which his realm affords, to set forth her charms; yes, that he represents one single glance of her eyes, one chain from the ornaments of her neck as possessed of the power to chain him to her completely. So also it is the beauty and god-like dignity, originally belonging to human nature, obscured indeed by sin, but not completely and for ever destroyed, which brought the Lord down to our earth and made Him our Redeemer, the royal bridegroom and loving husband of His church. But there is this difference between the earthly Solomon and his celestial antitype, that the latter becomes either the crown of thorns, or the crown of glory belonging to His resurrection and exaltation), whilst chronological expositors as REINHARD, HEUNISCH, etc., connect the wedding day with the epoch of CONSTANTINE the Great, or the conversion of the heathen in a body by the church, and Catholics like CORNELIUS A LAPIDE and CALMET explain the "mother" of Solomon of the Virgin Mary."

* [The two breasts are further explained in the notes of the DOWAY version to mean the love of God and the love of our neighbor; in the GENEVA, knowledge and zeal; by MOODY STUART and M. B. SMITH, faith and love; PATRICK, the preachers respectively among Jewish Christians and among the Gentiles; AINSWORTH, the loving affection, wholesome doctrines, sweet consolations and gracious beneficence of the church; SCOTT, the believer's simplicity of affection for Christ and the delight which Christ reciprocally takes in him; THRUPP, WEISS and WORDSWORTH, the fountains of nourishment whence is drawn the milk of pure and sound doctrine; while GILL allows a choice between ministers of the gospel, the two Testaments, the two Sacraments and the two great commandments of the law. BURROWES, whom none can suspect of an indisposition to allegorise, has the good taste to revolt at such mangling of inspired emblems. He says, p. 359, "In the comparison of the foregoing verses the thing to be illustrated is the general beauty of the pious soul in the eyes of Jesus. Losing sight of this most commentators have marred the passage by separating these emblems from one another, and appropriating them to other uses than the one intended by the Holy Spirit. What would be thought of a person who under the plea of heightening the effect of a picture by a great artist, should cut out the several figures, the trees, the waters, the tinted clouds, and exhibit them apart in every imaginable variety of light and position? This would show something more than want of judgment. No argument would be necessary to make us feel that such was never the mind of the artist. The common method of expounding this and the other kindred passages in the Song, seems no less unreasonable."] must restore the partially destroyed and hideously distorted beauty of His beloved before He can raise her to sit with Him on His throne; He must in order to effect this restoration endure the direst sufferings; He must redeem the poor captive from the prince of this world by the ransom of His own precious blood; and afterwards, too, He must with much trouble and pains seek to retain her whom He has dearly purchased in the way of righteousness and truth and preserve her from falling back again into the defilement of sin. The heavenly Solomon can never, during the course of this present world, attain to a really pure and undisturbed joy in His bride. He has quite too much to do in cleansing her ever anew with the washing of water by the word in order to present her to Himself holy and without blemish, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing (Eph. v. 26, 27). The heavenly bridegroom of souls can neither sing to His church as a whole, nor to its individual members such a praise of her beauty as was sung by Shulamith's husband, culminating in the encomium, "Thou art all fair, my dear, and there is not a blemish in thee," iv. 7. He has, on the contrary, but too abundant occasion to speak to her in the tone adopted in the 16th chapter of the prophet Ezekiel. He must too often hold up before her not only the wretchedness of her birth and the misery of the first days of her childhood, but also the gross unfaithfulness and scandalous defilement of the flesh and spirit, of which, though His elect and His beloved, she has since made herself guilty. And He must all the more postpone her entrance upon the full enjoyment of His blessed society and His heavenly benefits until the future state, for the reason that she is previously lacking in many respects in another virtue which is most of all commended in Shulamith, her historical type. This is:

c. The chaste and humble mind, which the beloved of the earthly Solomon still preserved even after her elevation to regal dignity and glory, that child-like, pure and obedient heart which she brings to her husband, and in virtue of which she will belong only to him and offer the sweet-scented flowers and delightful fruit of her garden to him for his exclusive enjoyment. On the ground of this most sterling of all the qualities of his beloved, this crown of her virtues, Solomon celebrates on the very day of his marriage, his perfect union with her; the locked garden, the bolted and sealed fountain is opened to him for his comfort and refreshment.—The Church, as the bride of the Lord, remains a mere bride so long as she has to suffer and to fight here below, because she does not remain a locked garden and a sealed fountain, to the extent that this could be affirmed of her Old Testament type; because, on the contrary, she too often admits the seductive and defiling powers of sin and of the world to the sanctuary of her virginity, and allows them to desecrate the temple of her heart. Not until the end of days will her perfect union with the heavenly bridegroom be consummated, when she has suffered and contended to the full, and the great mystery, of which Paul writes, Eph. v. 32, has been fulfilled by the final and visible coming of her beloved. Until then it is only individual souls in the midst of her, that band of His faithful and elect, who are truly known to the Lord alone (2 Tim. ii. 19; Rom. viii. 28 ff.), whom He raises to the blessed height of a most intimate communion with Himself, and by the outpouring of His love in their hearts makes them partakers of the full blessings of His heavenly grace. This is that invisible communion of saints, which, as the true salt of the earth and light of the world, forms the real soul of Christendom, the genuine realization of the idea of the Church; which, as the true Bride of the Lamb, day by day with longing hearts unites in the supplication of the Spirit: "Come, Lord Jesus," Rev. xxii. 17; which, as the entire body of the wise virgins (Matth. xxv. 10) with loins girded and lamps burning (Luke xii. 35) waits and watches until He comes "that is holy and that is true, that openeth and no man shutteth; and shutteth and no man openeth" (Rev. iii. 7): which shall therefore one day in glorious reality and with never-ending joy experience the fulfilment of that desire which bids them sigh and cry here below:

> Oh! come, do come, Thou Sun,
> And bring us every one
> To endless joy and light,
> Thy halls of pure delight.

FOURTH SONG.

Shulamith's longing for her home again awakened.

CHAP. V. 2—VIII. 4.

FIRST SCENE:

SHULAMITH AND THE DAUGHTERS OF JERUSALEM.

(CHAP. V. 2—VI. 3.)

SHULAMITH (relating a dream).

2 I[1] was sleeping, but my heart was waking[2]—
Hark![3] my beloved is knocking:
'Open[4] to me, my sister,
my dear, my dove, my perfect;[5]
for[6] my head is filled with dew, my locks with drops of the night!'
3 "I[7] have taken off my dress, how shall I put it on?
I have washed my feet,
how[8] shall I soil them?"—
4 My[9] beloved extended his hand through the window,[10] and I was inwardly excited[11] for him.
5 Up I rose to open to my beloved, and my hands dropped with myrrh, and my fingers with liquid myrrh, upon the handle of the bolt.
6 I opened to my beloved,
and my beloved had turned[12] away, was gone;

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 [WICL., MAT.: The voice of the Church.]

2 The unmistakably close connection of these words with what follows "Hark! my beloved knocking!" gives to both the participles יְשֵׁנָה and עֵר the sense of imperfects. HITZIG correctly says: "The connection makes the two partic. as well as דּוֹפֵק express the relative past (comp. Jer. xxxviii. 26; Ex. v. 8); and this first part of the verse is therefore—בַּחֲלוֹמִי Gen. xli. 17."

3 Lit. "The sound of my beloved knocking," etc. Comp. ii. 8. דּוֹפֵק is not in apposition to דּוֹדִי, but the predicate, and for this reason is without the article; comp. Gen. iii. 8 [see GREEN's Chrestom., p. 95, on this passage]. HITZIG correctly: "קוֹל is just the knocking, and is known to be קוֹל דּוֹדָה by the accompanying words."

4 [MAT.: Christ to the Church.]

5 [COV., MAT., CRAN., BISH.: darling. GENEV., ENG. VER.: undefiled.]

6 שֶׁ before רֹאשִׁי assigns the reason as אֲשֶׁר Eccles. vi. 12, or as כִּי Cant. ii. 11.

7 [MAT.: The voice of the spousess.]

8 The prolonged form אֵיכָכָה instead of אֵיךְ or אֵיכָה serves to make the question more emphatic, like our "How could I....? How can you ask me to.....?"

9 [MAT.: The voice of the Church speaking of Christ.]

10 [WICL., MAT.: hole. GENEV., ENG. VER.: hole of the door.]

11 [GENEV.: Mine heart was affectioned toward him. Marg. as ENG. VER.: my bowels were moved.]

12 חמק cognate with חבק "to embrace" is substantially synonymous with סבב "to turn;" comp. the Hith. in the sense of "turning and forsaking," Jer. xxxi. 22, as well as the substantive חַמּוּקִים "that which is turned or rounded," vii. 2 below. "He had turned away" is now strengthened by adding the synonyme עָבַר to express his total disappearance. SYMMACHUS correctly: ἀπονεύσας ἀπῆλθε, and still better the VULG.: "at ille declinaverat atque transierat;" for the pluperfect sense of the verbs is demanded by the context.

my soul failed,[1] when he spoke;[2]
I sought him but I did not find him,
I called him but he answered me not.
7 Found[3] me then the watchmen, who go around in the city;
they struck me, wounded me, took my veil[4] off from me,
the watchmen of the walls.
8 I[5] adjure you, ye daughters of Jerusalem, if ye find my beloved—what shall ye tell him?
"that I am sick of love."

Daughters of Jerusalem.

9 What[6] is thy beloved more than (any other) beloved,[7] thou fairest among women?
What is thy beloved more than (any other) beloved,
that thou dost adjure us thus?

Shulamith.

10 My[8] beloved is white and ruddy, distinguished above ten thousand.
11 His head is pure gold, his locks are hill upon hill,[9]
black as a raven.[10] 12 His eyes like doves by brooks of water, bathing in milk, sitting on fulness.[11] 13 His cheeks like a bed of balm, towers of spice plants;[12]
his lips lilies, dropping liquid myrrh.
14 His hands golden rods, encased in turquoises;[13]
his body a figure of ivory, veiled with sapphires.

1 Comp. Gen. xliii. 8: יָצָא לֵב. [Cov., Mat.: Now like as aforetime, when he spake, my heart could not refrain. Wicl., Dow.: melted. Burrowes: sunk in consequence of what he had said. Noyes, better: I was not in my senses while he spake.]

2 Others read instead of בְּדַבְּרוֹ, בְּדָבְרוֹ and either explain this from the Arabic as equivalent to בְּעָבְרוֹ "at his going away, at his departure" (Ew., etc.) or (comparing the Arab. dabra—אַחֲרָיו "behind him," (Hitz.) with which Umbreit's reference of בְּדָבְרוֹ to a verb דָּבַר "to follow" ("I went out to follow him") substantially agrees. But all these explanations, as well as that of Weissbach, according to which we should read בִּדְבָרוֹ "on his account, for his sake," lack the requisite confirmation in point of language.

3 [Mat.: The Church complaineth of her persecutors.]

4 [Wicl.: mantle. Cov., Mat.: garment. Cran., Bish.: kerchief. Dow.: cloak.]

5 [Mat.: The spousess speaketh to her companions.]

6 [Wicl.: The voice of friends saith to the Church. Which is thy lemman (lover) of the loved? Mat.: The voice of the Synagogue. Who is thy love above other lovers—or what can thy love do more than other loves?]

7 מִדּוֹד beyond any one who is a beloved, i. e., more excellent than any other. דּוֹד here simply states the idea in a general form, and מִן is comparative, expressing the superiority of one thing above another, as in 10 b.

8 [Wicl.: The voice of the Church of Christ saith to the friends. Mat.: The Church answering of Christ.]

9 [Wicl.: as bunches of palms. Dow.: as the branches of palm trees. Genev.: curled. Eng. Ver.: bushy. Thrupp in imitation of the reduplicated form in Hebrew: flow flowingly.]

10 [Cov., Mat.: brown as the evening.]

11 [Cov., Mat.: remaining in a plenteous place. Cran., Bish.: set like pearls in gold. Genev.: remain by the full vessels. Dow.: sit beside the most full streams. Eng. Ver.: fitly set; Marg.: sitting in fullness, that is, fitly placed and set as a precious stone in the foil of a ring.]

12 [Cov., Mat., Cran., Bish.: His cheeks are like a garden bed wherein the apothecaries plant all manner of sweet things.]

13 [Cov., Mat.: His hands are full of gold rings and precious stones; his body is like the pure ivory, decked over with sapphires. Cran., Bish.: his hands are like gold rings having enclosed the pleasant stone of Tharsis. Dow.: his hands wrought round of gold, full of hyacinths. Genev.: his hands as rings of gold set with the chrysolite.]

15 His legs columns of white marble set on bases of pure gold;
his aspect like Lebanon, choice[1] as the cedars.
16 His palate[2] is sweets,[3] and he is altogether precious.[4]
This is my beloved, and this[5] my friend, ye daughters of Jerusalem.

DAUGHTERS OF JERUSALEM.

VI. 1 Whither[6] has thy beloved gone,
thou fairest among women?
whither has thy beloved turned,
that we may seek him with thee?

SHULAMITH

2 My[7] beloved has gone down to his garden, to the beds of balm[8], to feed[9] in the gardens and to gather lilies.[10] 3 I am my beloved's and my beloved is mine, who feeds among the lilies.

SOLOMON TO THE SAME AS BEFORE.

(CHAP. VI. 4.—VII. 6.)

SOLOMON.

4 Fair[11] art thou, my dear, as Tirzah, comely as Jerusalem, terrible[12] as bannered[13] hosts,

[1] בָּחוּר "chosen, excellent" (not "young man," as TARG., MAGN., EW., BÖTTCH. have it) is evidently intended to indicate the pre-eminence of the cedars above all other trees, their surpassing height and stately form. Comp. דָּגוּל ver. 10 above, which is substantially synonymous, as well as the expressions מִבְחַר אֲרָזִים Jer. xxii. 7, and מִבְחוֹר בְּרֹשִׁים (together with קוֹמַת אֲרָזִים) 2 Kings xix. 23. This word moreover belongs to מַרְאֵהוּ as its predicate; for it is too remote to refer it to the suffix attached to this word, or to a new subject derived from it (HITZ.).

[2] [COV., MAT., DOW.: his throat. CRAN., BISH.: the words of his mouth. GENEV., ENG. VER.: his mouth; Marg.: palate.]

[3] On the plur. מַמְתַקִּים "sweetnesses" see EW. Lehrb. § 179, a [GREEN's Heb. Gram. § 201, 1, a and c].

[4] מַחֲמַדִּים lit. "preciousnesses, desirable things;" comp. Joel iv. 5; Hos. ix. 16; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 19.

[5] On the repeated זֶה comp. Gen. iii. 15.

[6] [WICL.: The voice of holy souls, of the church. MAT.: The voice of the synagogue speaking to the church.]

[7] [WICL., MAT.: The voice of the church.]

[8] In regard to עֲרוּגוֹת בֹּשֶׂם comp. on v. 13 above.

[9] [COV., MAT., CRAN., BISH.: that he may refresh himself.]

[10] [THRUPP: Note in the Hebrew of this verse not only the rhyme between בגנים and שושנים, but also the resemblance in sound between לערוגות and לרעות. COV., MAT.: flowers. CRAN.: roses.]

[11] [WICL., MAT.: The voice of Christ to the church. WICL.: Fair thou art, my love, sweet and fair as Jerusalem. COV., MAT.: Thou art pleasant, O my love, even as loveliness itself; thou art fair as Jerusalem, glorious as an army of men with their banners.]

[12] [GOOD, PERCY, TAYLOR, THRUPP: dazzling.]

[13] נִדְגָּלוֹת lit., provided with a דֶּגֶל banner, gathered about a standard (comp. Num. i. 52; ii. 2; Ps. xx. 6); not, "distinguished, select," as WEISSB. misled by the affinity between this expression and דָּגוּל v. 10 supposes. The fem. נִדְגָּלוֹת is not to be explained by a מַחֲנוֹת understood (IBN EZRA), but it "expresses the idea of a collective, as in אֹרְחָה and גּוֹלָה" (HITZ.).

5 Turn away thine eyes from[1] me, for they have taken me by storm.[2]
Thy hair is as a flock of goats, reposing on Gilead.
6 Thy teeth as a flock of sheep,[3] that go up from the washing, all of which have twins,
and there is not a bereaved one among them.
7 Like a piece of pomegranate thy cheek from behind thy veil.—
8 There are sixty queens and eighty concubines and virgins without number.
9 My dove, my perfect is one,[4]
the only one[5] of her mother, the choice[6] one of her that bare her.
Daughters saw her and called her blessed, queens and concubines and they praised her:
10 "Who[7] is this, that looks forth like the dawn, fair as the moon, pure as the sun, terrible as bannered hosts?"[8]

SHULAMITH.

11 To[9] the nut[10] garden I went down, to look at the shrubs of the valley, to see whether the vine sprouted, the pomegranates blossomed.

[1] WEISSB. preposterously: הָסֵבִּי עֵינַיִךְ מִנֶּגְדִּי is equivalent to "turn thine eyes away from thee to me," and then the only suitable sense in the second clause must be "thine eyes encourage me." [So THRUPP: מִנֶּגֶד "opposite, over-against." The full meaning is "Thou who art standing over against me, bend thou thine eyes so as directly to meet mine."] Against this excessively artificial and over-refined interpretation of מִנֶּגֶד one single parallel is decisive, Isa. i. 16: הָסִירוּ — מִנֶּגֶד עֵינָי "put away—from before mine eyes."

[2] The Hiph. הִרְהִיב from רהב "to rage, be violent," most probably expresses a sense corresponding to the predicate אֲיֻמָּה, consequently not "to encourage, inspire courage," as in Ps. cxxxviii. 3, but "to assault, violently excite, take by storm." [COV., MAT.: make me too proud. CRAN., BISH.: have set me on fire. DOW.: make me flee away. ENG. VER.: overcome me; Marg.: puffed me up. THRUPP: swell my heart with pride.]

[3] Verbally corresponding with iv. 2, except in the more special הַקְּצוּבוֹת "shorn" instead of the more general expression הָרְחֵלִים "lambs" used here. [This is the meaning of the word in Arabic, but in Heb. it means "ewes, sheep."]

[4] The numeral אַחַת one, forming a marked contrast with the sixty, eighty, etc., receives its proper limitation from the added הִיא: one she, i. e., she only. [It is better to regard הִיא as the copula like הֵמָּה in ver. 8. GREEN's Heb. Gram. § 258, 2]. That אֲחֹתִי "my sister" which stands with יוֹנָתִי תַמָּתִי "my dove, my perfect" in the parallel passage v. 2, can have influenced the selection of אַחַת "one" in this place, is very improbable (vs. WEISSB.).

[5] אַחַת הִיא cannot be taken here otherwise than it was before; the predicate is, therefore, wanting after this expression, as well as after the parallel בָּרָה הִיא, and hence the predicate of the preceding clause, viz: "my dove, my perfect" must be supplied here again. The meaning therefore is "only one, she alone is my dove, my darling; she alone of her mother (i. e. her only daughter), she as separated or chosen of her that bare her." So correctly WEISSB. in opposition to HITZ. who takes אַחַת the second time as the predicate and הִיא as subject: "she is the only one of her mother."

[6] On בָּרָה electa (VULG.) from ברר "to separate," comp. Ezek. xx. 38; Jer. xxiii. 28. [THRUPP: For the same reason that תַמָּתִי lit., "my perfect one" may be rendered "my own one" may בָּרָה, lit. "pure one" be rendered "sole darling." She is her parent's "pure one"; and this would in fact be the best rendering, had not the word "pure" in its original sense become somewhat antiquated.]

DAUGHTERS OF JERUSALEM.

VII. 1 Come[2] back, come back, Shulamith,
Come back, come back, that we may look upon thee.

SHULAMITH.

What[3] do you see in Shulamith?

DAUGHTERS OF JERUSALEM.

2 How[4] beautiful are thy steps in the shoes, O prince's daughter, thy rounded[5] thighs are like jewels, the work of an artist's hands.
3 Thy navel is a round bowl,[6] let not mixed wine be lacking![7] thy body is a heap of wheat, set[8] around with lilies.
4 Thy two breasts are like two fawns,
twins of a gazelle.
5 Thy neck like a tower of ivory, thy eyes like pools in Heshbon at the gate of the daughter of multitudes; thy nose like the tower of Lebanon which looks toward Damascus.
6 Thy head upon thee like Carmel,[9] and thy flowing locks like purple—a king fettered by curls![10]

GENEV.: I knew nothing, my soul set me as the chariots of my noble people. ENG.VER.: My soul made me like the chariots of Ammi-nadib; Marg.: Set me on the chariots of my willing people. THRUPP: "All translations which introduce a preposition before 'the chariots'—'on,' 'to,' 'among,' 'on account of,' etc., are grammatically untenable." He renders: my soul had made me the chariots of my people the Freewilling.] נַפְשִׁי שָׂמַתְנִי limits the meaning of the preceding לֹא יָדַעְתִּי, though there is no necessity of supplying כִּי. The relation is rather such that the preceding principal clause is logically subordinated to the limiting and explanatory clause annexed to it, and thus yields some such sense as "without my knowing it, unawares my desire, etc;" comp. Job ix. 5, Isa. xlvii. 11 as well as HITZ. and HENGSTENB. in loc. נַפְשִׁי—which can neither be the object, nor in apposition with the subject of יָדַעְתִּי—might it is true, have the sense of "I myself" (comp. Hos. ix. 4; Job ix. 21; Ps. iii. 3, etc.), but as the subject of the verb שָׂמַתְנִי obtains the sense of "desire, longing," which is attested by Gen. xxiii. 8; Job xxiii. 13; 2 Kin. ix. 15, etc.

THIRD SCENE:

SOLOMON AND SHULAMITH (alone).

(CHAP. VII. 7.—VIII. 4.)

SOLOMON.

7 How fair art thou and how comely,
O love,[1] among delights![2]
8 This thy stature resembles a palm tree, and thy breasts clusters.[3] 9 I[4] resolve: I will climb the palm, will grasp its branches,[5] and[6] be thy breasts, please, like clusters of the vine, and the breath of thy nose[7] like apples, 10 And thy palate[8] like the best wine. . . . .

SHULAMITH (interrupting him).

—going[9] down for my beloved smoothly,[10] gliding over the lips of sleepers.
11 I am my beloved's, and for[11] me is his desire. — — 12 Come,[12] my beloved, let us go out to the country,[13] lodge in the villages, 13 Start early[14] for the vineyards;
we shall see whether the vine has sprouted, its blossoms opened,[15]
the pomegranates flowered . . . .
there will I give thee my love.[16]

[1] [WICL.: Thou most dearworth. COV., MAT.: my darling. GENEV.: O my love.]
[2] [THRUPP, who is quite too fond of ingenious emendations: "O daughter of allurements. We may follow the SYRIAC and AQUILA in dividing the בתענגים of our Hebrew text into the two words בת ענגים."]
[3] [COV., MAT.: like the grapes.]

[8] [WICL., COV., MAT., DOW.: throat. CRAN.: jaws. BISH., GENEV., ENG. VER.: the roof of thy mouth.]
[9] [WICL.: The church saith of Christ,—worthy to my love to drink, to the lips and to the teeth of him to chew. COV., MAT.: this shall be pure and clear for my love; his lips and teeth shall have their pleasure. CRAN.: which goeth straight unto my beloved and bursteth forth by the lips of the ancient elders. BISH.: which is meet for my best beloved, pleasant for his lips and for his teeth to chew. GENEV.: which goeth straight to my well-beloved and causeth the lips of the ancient to speak. DOW.: worthy for my beloved to drink and for his lips and his teeth to ruminate. ENG. VER.: that goeth down sweetly (Marg. straightly) causing the lips of those that are asleep (Marg. the ancient) to speak. THRUPP: "In so difficult a passage some variations of text must be expected; and for שפתי ישנים 'the lips of the sleepers,' the LXX, SYRIAC and AQUILA apparently concur in reading שפתי ושנים 'my lips and teeth;' to which reading the versions of SYMMACHUS and JEROME also lend partial and indirect support. It has, however, the disadvantage of being ungrammatical, the true Hebrew for 'my lips and teeth' being שפתי ושני. Moreover, the received text is decidedly upheld by the TARGUM, and yields a more appropriate meaning."]

[10] On הוֹלֵךְ לְמֵישָׁרִים lit. "going according to evenness" (in an even, smooth way) comp. the similar הִתְהַלֵּךְ בְּמֵישָׁרִים Prov. xxiii. 31; also Isa. viii. 6.

COV, MAT., CRAN.: There will I turn me unto my love, and he shall turn him unto me. BISH.: I am my beloved's and he shall turn him unto me. GENEV.: I am my well-beloved's (ENG. VER.: beloved's) and his desire is toward me. GINSBURG: "It is for me to desire him. עָלַי lit. on me, i. e. it is upon me as a duty, thus 2 Sam. xviii. 11; Prov. vii. 14"]

[15] The Piel פִּתַּח is to be taken reflexively, "opened themselves" (DEL., HENGSTENB., MEIER), perhaps also inchoatively, "whether they are opening, are on the point of bursting" (EW., HEILIGST., VAIH. &c.). For סְמָדַר comp. on ii. 13.

[16] On אֶתֵּן אֶת־דֹּדַי comp. Prov. xxix. 17. [WICL. omits. COV., MAT., CRAN. BISH., my breasts.]

14 The mandrakes[1] give forth their odor, and over our doors are all sorts of excellent fruit,[2]
new as well as old,
(which), my beloved, I have laid up for thee.[3]—

VIII. 1 O[4] that thou wert as a brother of mine, who sucked the breasts of my mother!
should I find[5] thee without I would kiss thee, yet[6] none would despise[7] me.

2 I would lead thee, bring thee to my mother's house, thou[8] wouldst instruct me;
I would give thee to drink of the spiced wine, of my pomegranate juice.

3 His left hand is under my head,
and his right embraces me.[9]—

4 I[10] adjure you, ye daughters of Jerusalem, that ye wake not, and that ye waken not love, till it please.

[1] [Wicl.: the mandrakes give their smell in our gates. All apples new and old, my love, I kept to thee. Cov., Mat.: there shall the mandragoras give their smell beside our doors; there, O my love, have I kept unto thee all manner of fruits both new and old.]

[2] [Genev.: All sweet things.]

[3] This last clause cannot be taken as an independent sentence (Döpke, Rosenm., Hengstenb.) for then the verb would have "new fruit" likewise for its object. אֲשֶׁר must be supplied and the resulting relative clause must only be connected with the last predicate יְשָׁנִים (correctly Hitz.).

[4] [Wicl., Mat.: The voice of the patriarchs speaking of Christ. Wicl.: Who to me giveth [Dow. shall give to me] thee my brother sucking the teats [Dow. breasts] of my mother, that I find thee alone without forth [Dow. I may find thee without] and kiss thee. Cov., Mat.: O that I might find thee without and kiss thee, whom I love as my brother, which sucked my mother's breasts; and that thou wouldst not be offended if I took thee and brought thee, etc. Cran.: —— and that thou shouldst not be despised. I will lead thee and bring thee, etc.]

[5] On the conditional clause without אִם, and with nothing to mark the apodosis, comp. Hos. viii. 12; Prov. xxiv. 10; Judg. xi. 36.

[6] גַּם yet, nevertheless, see Ew. § 341, a, [Gesen. Lex. in verb.]

[7] On בּוּז see ver. 7 below, Prov. vi. 30. Instead of לִי me some inferior MSS. read לָךְ thee, which however seems far less appropriate, and has doubtless been repeated here from the close of the preceding verse. All the ancient versions read לִי. [Genev.: they should not despise thee; Marg. me].

[8] [Wicl., Dow., Genev.: Thou shalt teach me. Cov., Mat., Cran., Bish.: that thou mightest teach me. Eng. Ver.: who would instruct me.]

[9] This exclamation differs from that in ii. 6, with which in other respects it agrees verbatim, merely in the omission of לְ after תַּחַת, just as תַּחַת stands alone also in ver. 5 b, so likewise in Ex. xxiv. 4; xxxii. 19. We have already seen vi. 3; iv. 1; vii. 4, etc. that the poet does not like exact verbal repetitions of formulas before used.

[10] [Wicl., Mat.: The voice of Christ.] Repeated with some freedom from ii. 7; iii. 5. In place of אִם there, a prohibitory מָה is introduced here (see Ewald, § 325, b, comp. also on v. 8 above) [Ainsworth, with more scrupulous adherence to the form of the Hebrew expression; why should ye stir, and why should ye stir up the love.] And by omitting the gazelles and hinds of the field as well as contracting עַד שֶׁתֶּחְפָּץ into one word by means of Makkeph, a rhythmical reduction of the whole exclamation to a verse of but two members has been attained.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. The place of the action in this new section is without doubt the same as in the foregoing act. The dialogue with the daughters of Jerusalem (v. 8, 9, 16; vi. 1–3; vii. 1); the mention of the "city" and the "keepers of its walls" in this fresh recital of a dream (v. 2–7) which reminds one of its predecessor (iii. 1–5); the "garden" of Solomon, to which he has gone down, vi. 2; finally and above all her appeal to her lover to go out with her "to the country" (vii. 12) and to the house of his chosen one's mother (viii. 2), and there in the enjoyment of simple country pleasures to become to her "as a brother who had sucked the breasts of her mother" (viii. 1); all this points to the king's palace at Jerusalem as the scene, and more probably to some room in this palace, than to "contiguous grounds" or "the royal gardens," as is thought by Delitzsch. The room in the palace on Zion, which, according to scene 2 of the foregoing act, was used for the marriage feast, may very well be the one in which the whole of the present act was performed; for there is no indication any where of a change of scene, not even between vii. 1 and 2, or between vers. 6 and 7 of the same chapter (vs. Del.).—The time of the action is determined by its characteristic contents to have been some days or weeks later than the wedding festivities described in act third. For the relation of love so pure and happy at the beginning has since suffered certain checks and interruptions, which reveal themselves on the part of Shulamith at least by various symptoms of uneasiness, nay, of sadness and dejection, without her betraying, however, that she has been at all wounded or actually injured by her husband. The dream, which she tells her companions at the beginning of the section that she has very recently had in the night, begins exactly like the preceding, and runs on partly in the same way. It does not, however, end as that does in a bright and joyous manner, but with pain and fright. Seeking her beloved by night, she not only fails to find him—she is beaten and robbed by the watchmen! Her gloomy misgiving in respect to the unfaithfulness of her lover, expressed in her apprehension that she might soil her feet again, which had just been washed (v. 8, see in loc.), proves to be only too correct, and drives her therefore with an anxious and troubled heart to have it said to her lover, who has actually forsaken her for a time, "that she is sick of love"—of loving solicitude about his heart partially averted and alienated from her (v. 8)! She expresses this solicitude, it is true, not by open complaint; on the contrary, in what follows she sedulously avoids dropping any thing to the disadvantage of her husband in the hearing of the ladies of the court (v. 10–16), she apologizes for his leaving her by the harmless assumption that he may have gone "to feed in the gardens and to gather lilies," vi. 2, and only inserts in her exclamation at the close an allusion indicative of painful longing in respect to the way that she wishes to be and to remain her beloved's, viz., that he should now as formerly "feed among the lilies," that he should be and remain a guileless, pure and simple-hearted country lover (vi. 3)!—When, therefore, Solomon himself returns to her after a considerable absence, the manifestations of her partial dissatisfaction with him assume a somewhat altered form. She regards him gravely and sternly, and thus leads him in the picture of her beauty and loveliness, which, full of ecstacy, he again begins to sketch (vi. 4 ff.; comp. iv. 1 ff.) to introduce some allusions to her "terribleness" (vi. 4, 10), as well as to the effect of the glance of her eyes (vi. 5 a), which "overcome" or "dismay" him. The spirited statement of the prior rank accorded to her above all his wives and virgins, into which this description finally passes (vi. 8–10), she leaves wholly unnoticed; nay, she answers it with a description of what she once did and was engaged in, when a simple country maid in happier circumstances, and with more agreeable surroundings (vi. 11), and thereupon she gives him plainly enough to understand that the elevation bestowed upon her in consequence of her love "to the state-carriages of her people, the noble," i. e. to the highest rank among the nobles of her people, had also led to her being painfully undeceived (vi. 12). She even wishes to escape from the society of the voluptuous ladies of the court, which has become irksome to her, and she is induced to return and remain, not so much by their urgent entreaties and representations (vii. 1) as simply and alone by her unconquerable love to Solomon, whom she hopes finally to free from his corrupt surroundings and to gain wholly for herself and for the purer pleasures of her life at home.—To the new and exaggerated laudation of her charms, in which her lover hereupon indulges (vii. 2 ff.) she listens in silence; as in one place at least they offend against the rules of modesty (vii. 8), she deigns not to answer. Not until the other ladies had left her alone with Solomon, does she venture to open her heart to him and to give free expression to her longing desire, which has been most strongly aroused, to return to her home and to have her lover changed from a voluptuous servant of sin to an innocent child of nature like herself. She does this by interrupting (vii. 10) the fond language of her husband just where it had become most urgent and tender, and chiming in with what had been begun by him. With extraordinary address and delicacy she first, as it were, disarms and fetters him (vii. 10, 11) and then brings her desire before him with such overpowering force and urgency that refusal is impossible, and he is borne along as on the wings of the wind by her pure love, which triumphs thus over the enticements and temptations of his court (vii. 12 ff.). He need not utter a word of express consent to her request; she has him completely in her power, and as he has just called himself "a king fettered by her locks" (vii. 6), she but briefly refers to the fact, that his whole desire is toward her (vii. 11 b), that "his left arm is under her head, and his right embraces her" (viii. 3), and then leaves the scene on the arm of her beloved with that exclamation twice before uttered to the daughters of Jerusalem (viii. 4), and which this time has the force of farewell advice.*

* [That Solomon had given Shulamith any occasion for disquietude, or that her pain at his absence arose from a suspicion of the constancy, warmth or purity of his affection, is the merest figment without the shadow of a foundation in the language of the Song. Solomon is Shulamith's ideal as she is his. She does not utter one word of complaint to others or of reproach to him. There is nothing to imply that in her most secret thoughts she censures him for an absence which is intolerable to her. As far as there is any blame in the case, she casts it upon her own drowsy sluggishness, which forbore to open to him promptly and grant him the admission that he sought. Even this, however, occurring as it did in a dream, seems to be told not so much in a spirit of self-reproach as to demonstrate that she was "sick of love." She longs for her beloved every moment, and, sleeping or waking, he is ever in her thoughts, and she is uneasy and restless when he is not by her side. But her confidence is unabated that she is her beloved's and her beloved is hers, vi. 3. Her language respecting him is that of affectionate admiration, v. 10, etc., and his to her is that of the most tender fondness, vi. 4, etc. There has been a brief separation, but there is nothing to indicate so much as a momentary estrangement on her part or on his.

The current allegorical interpretations seem here to be at fault in one direction as much as that of ZÖCKLER errs in the other. The image of ideal love presented in the Song should not be marred by the untimely introduction of any thing outside of itself, whether the sins and inconsistencies of the church or of believing souls on the one hand, or the actual historical character of Solomon as learned from Kings and Chronicles on the other. We are not at liberty to put constraint upon the language here employed for the sake of making the bride mirror forth the deficiencies of the Church or of preserving the consistency of Solomon's character as represented here with all that is recorded of him elsewhere.

The bride supplies an emblem of devoted attachment and faithful love, which is to be set before the Church as the ideal towards which she should tend, and after which she should aspire and struggle, rather than as a picture which has been or is realized in her actual life. It is a bride loving, longing for, delighting in her lord, but conscious of no unfaithfulness on her part and suspecting none on his.

And the bridegroom is equally removed from any charge of inconstancy. The military metaphor of vi. 4, 5, to which ZÖCKLER appeals, is not suggestive of frowns or of displeasure any more than iv. 4 or the strong language of iv. 9. It is her incomparable charms, the batteries of beauty and of love which assault him with such resistless energy that he pleads for quarter. Nor is there any foundation for the desire attributed to Shulamith to escape from Solomon's court or to have him forsake it on account of its presumed excesses. It certainly cannot be deduced from language which simply expresses an exquisite delight in natural objects, and a wish to enjoy them in the company of her beloved, and to possess the opportunity which would thus be afforded for uninterrupted and unrestricted converse. The language of the bride

2. The sketch here given of the inner progress of the action in the course of this act departs in several important particulars from the view of the later interpreters; but it appears to us to be the only one which corresponds with the language and the design of the poet. It is principally distinguished from the view of DELITZSCH, which approaches it most nearly, by its taking the "little disturbances" and troubles in the life of the newly married pair, which this scholar also affirms, to be more serious and real, and not restricting them for instance barely to the tragic contents of that story of her dream (v. 2–7) but letting the dissatisfaction of the chaste bride with the voluptuous conduct of the king and his court come properly forward as the actual cause of the clouded horizon of their married state. Our view too repels the assumption shared by DELITZSCH with several recent commentators, but destitute of proof, that the description of Shulamith's charms contained in vii. 2 ff. was occasioned by a "country-dance" which she was executing before him and the ladies of the court,—a hypothesis dubious in every point of view, and upon which Shulamith's character could scarcely be freed from moral taint (for the dance in question, the "dance of Mahanaim" can scarcely be conceived of as other than an unchaste pantomime); and from this it would be but a single step to the notion of RENAN that Solomon in this passage describes the charms of a danseuse of the harem, or to the similar one of HITZIG, that the king is here "cooing round a concubine." Finally our view differs in one point at least from that of DELITZSCH in respect to the division into scenes, inasmuch as it rejects the opening of a new scene or even act after vi. 9 (comp. in loc., as well as the Introduction, § 2, Rem. 2), and consequently takes the whole to be one act with three scenes, of which the first extends to vi. 8; the second to vii. 6; and the third from that to viii. 4. Against the assumption of a point of division after vii. 6 it has often indeed been urged (see e. g. Ew., HITZ., WEISSB., and HENGSTENB. too) that the passage vii. 2–10 forms a continuous description of the beauties of the beloved, beginning with her feet and ending with her nose and palate. But with the more general exclamation vii. 7, "How fair and how delightful art thou, O Love, among the joys!" this description evidently assumes an entirely different character from that it had before in vers. 2-6, where the individual members are enumerated very much as had been done previously (iv. 1-3 and vi. 5-7) only in inverted order, and certain comparisons are instituted with them. And what Shulamith says to her lover (vii. 10 ff.) in the closest connection with the second description (or rather interrupting it and proceeding of her own motion), is of such a nature that it can scarcely be conceived of as spoken in the presence of the "daughters of Jerusalem," who had been present before. On which account DELITZSCH's assumption that a new scene begins with vii. 7, does not in fact deserve so unceremonious an epithet as that of "purely gratuitous," which HITZIG bestows upon it. The assumption of HITZ., BÖTTCHER, REN. and HENGSTENBERG that a new scene does not begin until vii. 12, might with equal propriety be denominated gratuitous; and so might many other modes of division which differ from ours, e. g., that followed by EWALD, DÖPKE, BÖTTCHER, HITZ., HENGSTENB., etc., and in general by most of the recent writers according to which a new scene opens with vii. 2; that of VAIH. and others (particularly the older writers) which begins this new scene with vii. 1; the assertion of EWALD that vi. 10—vii. 1 is a dialogue between the ladies of the court and Shulamith which is repeated by Solomon, etc. The question as to the beginning and end of the scenes in this act moreover appears to be of little consequence, inasmuch as the locality of the action, as has been before shown, does not change.* The only matters involved are 1) an entrance at vi. 4 of Solomon, who had not been present before and 2) an exit or retirement of the chorus in the neighborhood of vii. 6, or vii. 11. And this retirement of the chorus is furthermore, as is shown by the epiphonema viii. 4, probably not to be conceived of as a total disappearance but simply as a withdrawal to the background, as toward the end of Act first (see above, p. 62).

vii. 11, 12 is entirely parallel to ii. 10-13 in the mouth of her lover. And the indelicacy alleged in vii. 2 is not in the pure language of the song, nor in the chaste and beautiful emblems employed, but must be wholly charged to the account of mal-interpretation. Commentators of what our author justly terms the profane-erotic class have put their own offensive glosses upon this Song; and some devout and evangelical interpreters have unfortunately made concessions which the facts of the case do not warrant. There is not the slightest taint of impurity or immodesty to be found in any portion of this elegant lyric.—TR.]

3. SCENE FIRST. a. SHULAMITH'S STORY OF HER DREAM, v. 2–8.—This like the similar passage iii. 1–5 must be a dream, which Shulamith had had shortly before, and which she now relates as indicative of the state of her mind. In opposition to the opinion that Shulamith is relating a real outward occurrence (DÖPKE, HAHN, WEISSB., etc.) may be urged both the analogy of that prior passage and that such an affair is inconceivable in the history of Solomon's love to Shulamith. It would have conflicted with decorum for that, which is narrated in vs. 2–5, to have actually taken place; and for the favorite of the king to have been beaten and robbed by the city nightwatch as is related ver. 7, would form the non plus ultra of historical improbability. Besides the visionary character of the experience described is indicated not only by the introductory words, when correctly explained, "I was sleeping but my heart was waking," but also by several characteristic particulars, as ver. 3 and 6.

Ver. 2. I was sleeping but my heart was waking.—HITZIG adduces a striking parallel to the thought that in a dream the heart or spirit is awake, while the rest of the person sleeps, from CIC. de divin. I. 30: "jacet corpus dormientis ut mortui, viget antem et vivit animus." WEISSBACH's objections (p. 211) to this parallel as inadmissible amount to nothing. Comp. F. SPLITTGERBER, Schlaf und Tod, nebst den damit zusammenhängenden Erscheinungen des Seelenlebens (Halle, 1866), p. 37 ff., espec. p. 43: "The soul is still in the body during sleep, though freer from it than in the state of wakefulness. It is in a condition of inner self-collection and concentration in order that it may afterwards operate with the greater force upon the course of things around it in its particular sphere of life." And p. 71, "The soul sinks down in sleep to its innermost life-hearth, and loses itself there in that potential self-consciousness, which forms the proper essential quality of our spirits;——whilst in dreams it lifts itself to a comparatively higher region, that of the dawning consciousness, as it were, a region which stands considerably nearer the surface of the outward life and the daily consciousness, which moves upon it, and whose images therefore leave behind more impressive traces in our memory, which extend into our waking moments." Hence GÖSCHEL not incorrectly remarks: "If sleep is to be conceived of as depression, (καταφορά), dreaming is elevation (αναφορά)." From this statement also it further appears why the view maintained by GROT. and DÖPKE, that אני ישנה ולבי ער denotes a condition midway between sleep and wakefulness, a semi-sleep, is superfluous; an opinion by the way, which has the meaning of the words against it, for "I slept" is not the same thing as "I was half asleep." The heart stands here in its customary O. Test. sense of the centre and organ of the entire life of the soul, not barely for the intellectual faculties of the soul, the region of thought, as HITZIG maintains. Comp. further on Prov. ii. 10 (in this commentary.)—Hark, my beloved is knocking: Open to me, my sister, my dear, my dove, my perfect. Compared with the similar passage ii. 8 this fond quadruple address shows a considerable advance in the relation between the loving pair. The predicate "my fair one," which there stands with "my dear" is here wholly wanting, and is supplied by the more intimate "my sister," which since Shulamith's marriage had become the common pet name, by which Solomon called her (see iv. 9, 10, 12, v. 1). He had it is true already said "my dove" to her before their nuptials (ii. 14, comp. again vi. 9); but "my perfect" is an entirely new appellation (comp. likewise again vi. 9), which it is likely was first adopted after their marriage, and by which Solomon probably designed to express her innocence and purity (תַּמָּה perfect, integra) in contrast with the character of his other wives, who were not so perfect and pure. For he can scarcely have employed this appellation unmeaningly, as "my angel" among us (vs. DÖPKE and HITZ.), [nor can it mean as THRUPP alleges "mine perfectly or entirely."]—For my head is filled with dew, my locks with drops of the night. The copiousness of the nightly fall of dew in Palestine is attested also by the well-known history of Gideon's fleece, Judg. vi. 38; comp. also Ps. cx. 3; 2 Sam. xvii. 12; Mic. v. 6; Bar. ii. 25. That Shulamith sees her lover come to her window dripping with the dew of the night, and chilly too in consequence, might seem to imply that she thought of him as a shepherd, who as ἀγραυλῶν "abiding in the field" (Luke ii. 8) had had to endure wet and cold, and hence had sought shelter in her dwelling. But to explain that representation it is sufficient to assume that the first half of her dream (vers. 2–4) transports her back to her home, or in other words that now in her dream, as she had done before when awake (see i. 7; ii. 16; iv. 6) she transfers her lover without more ado from the sphere of royalty to that of a shepherd's life. That in the latter half of her dream (vers. 6, 7) she thinks of him again as living in the city, and herself too as wandering about in the city looking for him, is a feature of the most delicate psychological truth, which has its analogue in the story of her previous dream, iii 1–4.

Ver. 3. I have taken off my dress. כֻּתָּנְתִּי lit., "my tunic, my under garment." She here too thinks herself back again in her former humble circumstances, where she commonly wore nothing but a tunic, χιτών (comp. Ex. xxii. 25 f.; 2 Sam. xiii. 18, also Mark vi. 9,) and consequently in the night was entirely unclothed with the exception of the warm covering or upper garment (שִׂמְלָה, Ex. ibid., Gen. ix. 23; Deut. xxii. 17) under which she slept.—I have washed my feet: how shall I soil them? This is again another particular referring back to her former scanty mode of life in the country. She did not then wear the shoes, which since her elevation to be a prince's daughter (vii. 2) she was now obliged to wear: on the contrary she ordinarily went barefoot in the house and in its immediate vicinity, except in long walks in the country when she wore sandals, (comp. Am. ii. 6, viii. 6; Deut. xxix. 4; Josh. ix. 5). Hence the feet washed before going to bed might easily get dirty again on the floor of the house. The soiling of the feet is in the religious and ethical region a symbol of moral contamination from the petty transgressions of every-day life (John xiii. 10); and in the figurative language of dreams it is a well-known symbol of moral defilement reproved by the conscience and accompanied with shame, comp. (SCHUBERT, Symbolik des Traums, 3d edit. p. 18, SPLITTBERGER, ibid. p. 128 ff.*). It is therefore from going out to her lover, this symbol of more intimate and enduring intercourse with him, that she apprehends the soiling of her feet. Hence the objections which she makes to complying with his request, and the cold, almost indifferent, if not exactly "rude" (DEL.) tone of her answer.†

Ver. 4. My beloved extended his hand through the window. מִן־הַחוֹר lit., from the hole,‡ i. e., through the latticed window (for that is certainly what is intended here, as appears from ii. 9, not a mere opening in the wall as HITZ. supposes) and from it toward me.§

* A marked instance of this is to be found in the well-known dream of the youthful Ansgar at Corbie, of the broad morass, which prevented him from coming to his mother and other pious women, whom he saw in the company of the blessed virgin on a delightful road, comp. A. TAPPEHORN, Leben des heil. ANSGAR, Apostels Von Dänemark, etc. Munst. 1863, p. 69 f. RIMBERT, Vita S. Ansgarii, c. 2, in Pertz, Monum. Germaniæ Tom. II. p. 690.

† [BURROWES states the true sense much more simply and correctly: "These words mean, that as the bride had retired to rest, she could not put herself to the trouble of arising even to let in the beloved."]

‡ [Not "withdrew his hand from the hole," a rendering mentioned by AINSWORTH, disapproved by WILLIAMS, and adopted by BURROWES and GINSBURG]

§ [PERCY: "It was the ancient custom to secure the door of a house by a cross bar or bolt; which at night was fastened with a little button or pin. In the upper part of the door was left a round hole, through which any person from without might thrust his arm, and remove the bar, unless this additional security were superadded." THRUPP: "The hole

This gesture of extending (שׁלח) the hand in does not signify his intention to climb in through the window (HITZ.), nor his desire to gain access by forcibly breaking a hole through the wall (HENGSTENBERG after Ezek. viii. 7, 8) [so WORDSWORTH], but is rather the expression of an urgent request to be admitted. The customary gesture of a petitioner is, it is true that of spreading forth his hands פָּרַשׂ כַּפָּיו (Ex. ix. 29–31, etc.) But this could not be done in the present instance on account of the smallness of the window and the darkness of the night, and would besides have been unsuitable in relation to his beloved, for everywhere else it appears only as a usage in prayer. He must here, therefore, in craving admission adopt a gesture, which would at the same time express his longing to be united with his beloved (comp. DEL. and WEISSB. in loc.)—And I was inwardly excited over him; lit., "my bowels* were agitated, sounded over him"—which according to Jer. xxxi. 20; Isa. xvi. 11; lxiii. 15 is equivalent to "I felt a painful sympathy for him." This was of course because she had let him stand out in the wet and cold. According to the reading עָלַי (so the so-called Erfurt Ms., see DE ROSSI in loc.) the feeling expressed would be regret instead of pity: "my bowels were agitated on me" (i. e. in me, or over me, on my account—comp. HITZ. and EW. in loc.) But this slenderly attested reading appears to have crept into the text from Ps. xlii. 6, 12, and for this reason to deserve no attention.

Ver. 5. Up I rose to open to my beloved. אֲנִי stands after קַמְתִּי without special emphasis, according to the more diffuse style of speaking among the people. So HITZ. no doubt correctly, whilst WEISSB., is certainly far astray in asserting that Shulamith means by this אֲנִי to emphasize "her entire person in contrast with any particular parts."† And my hands dropped with myrrh and my fingers with liquid myrrh upon the handle of the bolt. That is to say, as my hands touched the handle of the bolt (or lock on the door of the house) in order to shove it back and open it, they dropped, etc. עַל כַּפּוֹת הַמַּנְעוּל, whose genuineness MEIER suspects without any reason, plainly shows that the dropping of myrrh did not proceed from Shulamith's anointing herself, as she rose and dressed, (as MAGN. and WEISSB. imagine) [so too BURROWES], but from the fact that her lover had taken hold of the door on the outside with profusely anointed hands, and so had communicated the fluid unguent of myrrh to the bolt inside likewise.* This might have resulted from the unguent flowing in from the outer lock through the keyhole (HITZ.), or some drops of myrrh from the hand of her lover inserted through the hole above the door, might have trickled down upon the inner lock, which was directly beneath (DEL.). Too accurate an explanation of the affair seems inadmissible from the indefinite dreamlike character of the whole narrative. But at any rate an anointing of the outer lock of the door by the lover on purpose is not to be thought of (with LESS., DÖPKE, EW., VAIH., etc.) because though classic parallels† may be adduced for this "silent homage of love," none can be brought from oriental antiquity. —מוֹר עֹבֵר is not "overflowing myrrh,"‡ i. e., dealt out in copious abundance (EW.), but myrrh exuding or flowing out of itself in contrast with that which is solidified and gum-like, σμύρνα στακτή in contrast with σμ. πλαστή (THEOPHR. Hist. Plant. 9, 4); comp. מָר דְּרוֹר Ex. xxx. 23, as well as above on i. 13.

Ver. 6. I opened to my beloved, comp. on 5 a.—And my beloved had turned away, was gone. My soul failed when he spoke. That is, before, when he was speaking to me through the window (vers. 2, 4), my breath forsook me, my soul almost went out of me.§ It is consequently a supplementary remark, whose principal verb, however, is not necessarily to be taken as a pluperfect (vs. DÖPKE).—I sought him but I did not find him; I called him but he did not answer me. With the first is that through which according to the fashion of eastern doors, a person from without thrusts in his hand in order to insert the key and so to open it, see THOMSON The Land and the Book, chap. xxii."]

* [ALEXANDER (Comm. on Isa. xvi. 11): "The viscera are evidently mentioned as the seat of the affections. Modern usage would require heart and bosom. BARNES correctly applies to this verse the distinction which philologists have made between the ancient usage of bowels to denote the upper viscera and its modern restriction to the lower viscera, a change which sufficiently accounts for the different associations excited by the same or equivalent expressions then and now."]

† [THRUPP: "up I arose." Literally "I arose." So too at the beginning of the next verse the literal rendering is simply "I opened." But in both places the use, contrary to the Hebrew custom of the pronoun אֲנִי "I" is emphatic; and seems to indicate an alertness and forwardness, which must in an English rendering be expressed in some other manner.]

* [THRUPP thinks the myrrh came from the hands of the bridegroom, WORDSWORTH from those of the bride. WILLIAMS: "Commentators in general suppose that the perfume here called liquid myrrh, proceeded from the moisture of his hands, wet with dew; and the compliment in this view is very elegant and beautiful, implying that the fragrance of his body perfumed everything which came in contact with it. If the perfume, however, be referred to the spouse, I think it will imply that she had anointed herself with such luxuriancy that her fingers were still wet with myrrh; and this would partly account for her reluctancy to rise, since indulgence naturally induces sloth." GOOD and PATRICK strangely imagine that in her haste to reach the door she overturned a vase of fragrance which agreeably to oriental practice she had prepared for her lover.]

† Particularly Lucretius, IV. 1171:

> "At lacrimans exclusus amator limina sæpe
> Floribus et sertis operit, postesque superbos
> Unguit amaracino et foribus miser oscula figit."

Comp. also Tibull. I. ii. 14; Athenæ. ed. Casaubon, I. 669.

‡ [GOOD: "Pure or perhaps liquid myrrh, that which weeps or drops from the tree, the most esteemed but most expensive of this class of perfumes."]

§ [NOYES gives the most satisfactory explanation of this expression: "I was not in my senses; literally, 'my soul was gone from me.' The meaning most suited to the connection is, that she acted insanely in not admitting her beloved at his request. It seems to denote that bewilderment of the faculties caused by fear, as in Gen. xlii. 28, or by any other passion; here by the passion of love." Or rather the bewilderment intended would seem to be that strange want of self-possession so common in dreams, in consequence of which a person does precisely the wrong thing, and as the result, finds himself in most embarrassing and trying situations. WESTMINSTER ANNOTATIONS: "My neglect of his speech troubled me when he was gone." SCOTT: "Either she now recollected his former most tender and affectionate call which she had resisted; or he spake a reproving word as he withdrew, which filled her with extreme distress." THRUPP: "My soul failed me for what he had spoken. Here the reference must be to the words uttered by the bridegroom when he first presented himself at the door: for there is no record of his speaking subsequently." GINSBURG: "When he spoke of it, i. e., of his going away." MOODY STUART: "My soul failed for his speaking; with mingled desire and fear she listens till her soul faints within her."] of these lines comp. iii. 2 b; with both together Prov. i. 28; viii. 17.

Ver. 7. Found me then the watchmen, etc. Comp. iii. 3, Hitz. correctly: "In her previous dream the watchmen make no reply to her question; here without being questioned they reply by deeds."—Took my veil off from me. רְדִיד (from רָדַד spread out, disperse, make thin) is according to Isa. iii. 23 a fine light material thrown over the person like a veil, such as was worn by noble ladies in Jerusalem; comp. Targ. on Gen. xxiv. 65; xxxviii. 14 where רדידא represents the Heb. צָעִיף.* נָשְׂאוּ מֵעָלַי certainly means not a bare "lifting" (Meier), but a forcible tearing off and taking away of this article of dress; else this expression would not form with the preceding "they struck me, wounded me," the climax, which the poet evidently intends.—The watchmen of the walls; not the subject of the immediately preceding clause (Weissb.), but a repetition of the principal subject which stands at the beginning of the verse. In her complaint she naturally comes back to the ruffians who had done all this to her, the villainous watchmen.—"Watchmen of the walls," whose functions relate as in this instance to the interior of the city, and who, therefore, were not appointed principally with a view to the exterior circuit walls, occur also Isa. lxii. 6.

Ver. 8. I adjure you, etc. For this expression, as well as the masc. form of address, comp. on ii. 7.—What shall ye tell him? So correctly Ew., Heiligstedt, Del., Hengstenb. etc.; for although מָה sometimes expresses an earnest negative or prohibition, and might therefore be synonymous with אִם in ii. 7; iii. 5, yet the translation "do not tell him that I am sick of love" (Weissb. and others) yields a less natural sense than the one given above, according to which Shulamith seeks to induce her lover to a speedy return by the intelligence of her being sick of love. And in fact she connects a charge of this purport to the daughters of Jerusalem immediately with the narrative of her dream, because this had already evidenced in various ways that she had an almost morbid longing for her lover (see especially ver. 4, b; vers. 6, 7.)

4. Continuation. b. Shulamith's description of her lover, v. 9–16.

Ver. 9. What is thy beloved more than (any other) beloved, thou fairest among women? This question of the daughters of Jerusalem which serves in an admirable way to connect what precedes with the following description of the beauty of her lover, springs from the assumption readily suggested by vers. 2–4, that Shulamith's lover was some other than Solomon; an assumption admitted without scruple by the voluptuous ladies of the court, in spite of their knowledge of the fact that Shulamith had shortly before given her hand to the king as her lawful husband. It is therefore a question of real ignorance and curiosity,* which they here address to Shulamith, not the mere show of a question with the view of leading her to the enthusiastic praise of the king who was well known to the ladies of the court and beloved by them likewise (Del.); and quite as little was it a scornful question (Döpke, Meier) or reproachful (Magn.) or one involving but a gentle reproof (Hitz.)—against these last opinions the words "fairest among women" are decisive.

Ver. 10. My beloved is white and ruddy, distinguished above ten thousand. This general statement precedes the more detailed description of the beauties of her lover, which then follows vers. 11-15 in ten particulars, at the close of which (ver. 16) stands another general eulogium.—The aim of the entire description is evidently to depict Solomon, as one who is without blemish from head to foot, as is done 2 Sam. xiv. 25, 26 in the case of his brother Absalom. A commendation of his fair color, or his good looks in general fitly stands at the head of the description.—צַח lit., "dazzling white;" stronger than לָבָן; an expression which may be applied to a king's son, but scarcely to a simple young shepherd from the country. His face might very well be called ruddy or brownish (as 1 Sam xvi. 12) but scarcely dazzling white; and it is to the face that the predicate mainly refers, as a comparison with vers. 14 and 15 shows.—To white as the fundamental color is added the blooming red (אָדוֹם) of the cheeks and other parts of the face both here in the case of Solomon and Lam. iv. 7 in the description of the fair Nazarites of Jerusalem, which reminds one of the passage before us.—"Distinguished above ten thousand," lit. "from ten thousand, or a myriad" (רְבָבָה), i. e., surpassing an immense number in beauty. Comp. Ps. xci. 7, as well as the plur. רבבות Ps. iii. 7; Deut. xxxiii. 17.—דָּגוּל from דֶּגֶל "standard, banner," as in Lat. insignis from signum, denotes one that is conspicuous as a standard amidst a host of other men, signalized, distinguished above others, and מִן is again comparative as in ver. 9. The expression is evidently a military one like נִדְגָּלוֹת vi. 4, 10.

Ver. 11. His head is pure gold. The comparison is not directed to the color of the face, as though this was to be represented as a reddish brown (Hitz.), but to the appearance of the head as a whole. From the combined radiance of his fresh and blooming countenance, and of his glossy black hair adorned with a golden crown, it presented to the beholder at a distance the appearance of a figure made of solid gold with a reddish lustre. כֶּתֶם according to Gesen., Hengstenb., and others, equivalent to that which is hidden, concealed=gold that is treasured up; according to Dietrich and others from כתם "to be solid, dense," hence massive gold; according to Hitz., Weissb., etc., equivalent to that which is *[Thrupp: "It seems to be generally agreed that the word רדיד occurring here, and at Isaiah iii. 23, denotes a wide and thin garment, such as Eastern ladies to the present day throw over all the rest of their dress. The Germans well translate it Schleierkleid, veil-garment." Good: "To tear away the veil from an Eastern lady is one of the greatest indignities that can be offered to her."]

*[Much better Thrupp: "That the dramatic form may be preserved a question is here put by the chorus of the Daughters of Jerusalem in order to furnish occasion for the description which follows." It is also to be observed that the inquiry is not who he is, as though it implied their ignorance of his person, but what is he. They simply wish to draw from her her estimate of him.—Tr.]

reddish, of red lustre, which latter explanation is favored by Arabic parallels and by the expression נכתם Jer. ii. 22. The adjective פָּז connected with it designates this gold as carefully refined and purified (comp. the Hoph. part. מוּפָז with the like sense 1 Kin. x. 18).—His locks are hill upon hill. תַּלְתַּלִּים may be thus explained with Del., Weissb., etc., by deriving it from תָּלַל to raise, heap up (whence תֵּל a hill and תָּלוּל high, Ezek. xvii. 22). Commonly "palm branches," ("flexible or curling palm branches" from תלל in the sense of "wavering or swaying to and fro"); or "pendent, hanging locks" (from תלה suspendit—so Hengstenb.); or "pendulous clusters of grapes" (as though זַלְזַלִּים=תלתלים Isa. xviii. 5—so Hitz.). The comparison reminds us somewhat of that with the flock of goats on Mount Gilead (iv. 2; vi. 5); which was also designed to set forth his long curling locks piled one on another.—Black as a raven. Parallels to this simile from Arab. poets, see in Hartmann, Ideal weibl. Schönheit, I. 45 f., comp. Magnus on Cant. iv. 1 (p. 85) and Döpke in loc. The latter adduces particularly two verses of Motanebbi (from J. v. Hammer, p. 11):

> "Black as a raven and thick as midnight gloom, > Which of itself, with no hairdresser, curls."

Ver. 12. His eyes like doves by brooks of water. On the comparison of the eyes with doves comp. i. 15. In this case it is not doves in general, but particularly doves sitting "by brooks of water" (lit. water-channels or beds) to which the eyes are likened doubtless in order to represent the lustrous brightness and the moisture of the white of the eye by a figure like that employed vii. 5, and to place it in fitting contrast with the iris whose varied hues resemble the plumage of the dove.—Bathing in milk, sitting on fulness. A further description of the relation of the "doves" to the "brooks of water," i. e. of the iris (with the pupil) to the white that surrounds it. These water-brooks here appear to be filled up with milk instead of water, and the doves answering to the irides of both eyes are represented as bathing in this milk and accordingly as "sitting on" or "by fulness"—in which there is an allusion likewise to the convex form of the eye (correctly the Septuag., Vulg., Syr., and after them Hengstenb., Weissbach, etc.). מִלֵּאת, lit. "fulness," an idea undefined in itself, is here limited by the preceding אפיק' מים and therefore means "the fulness of the water-courses, that which fills them up" (Weissb.); and the עַל which stands before it, indicates the same sense substantially of sitting by this fulness, as is expressed by the same preposition before אפיק' מים (comp. Ps. i. 3). Others take מִלֵּאת in the sense of "setting" as of a gem (comparing מִלֵּאת אֶבֶן Ex. xxviii. 17) and hence translate "enthroned in a setting" (Magn.) or "jewels finely set" (Böttch., Del., preceded by Ibn Ezra, Jarch., Rosenm., Winer). But in opposition to this may be urged both the absence of אֶבֶן after the indefinite מלאת, and the prep. עַל instead of which בְּ might rather have been expected. More correctly Coccejus and Döpke, who explain it "over the setting" i. e. "over the edge of the brook," though still they do violence to the natural meaning of מלאת.

Ver. 13. His cheeks like a bed of balm. The tert. compar. is not barely their delightful fragrance, but likewise the superb growth of beard upon his cheeks. Shulamith would scarcely have compared beardless cheeks with a bed of balm, i. e. a garden plot covered with plants. That she likens the two cheeks to but one bed may be explained from the fact that the beard, which likewise surrounds the chin and lips, unites them into one whole, which like the borders in many gardens has its two parallel sides (comp. Hitzig). The punctuation עֲרוּגֹת, which the ancient versions seem to have followed (e. g. Vulg. "sicut areolæ aromatum") and which Weissb. still prefers, accordingly appears to be less suitable than the sing. עֲרוּגַת here retained by the Masorites; whilst the plur. עֲרוּגוֹת is unquestionably the true reading in vi. 2.—Towers of spice plants. The expression מִגְדְּלוֹת מֶרְקָחִים is doubtless so to be understood, as explanatory apposition to עֲרוּגַת הַבֹּשֶׂם and the bed of balm is accordingly to be conceived of as a plot embracing several "towers" or pyramidal elevations of aromatic herbs, by which the rich luxuriance of his beard and perhaps also its fine curly appearance is most fitly set forth (Ew., Delitzsch, Hengstenb., etc.). We can see no ground for the scruples, which are alleged to stand in the way of this explanation, or why we must with J. Cappellus suppose a reference to "boxes of unguents" (pyxides unguentorum) or with Hitzig, Friedr., Weissb., follow the Septuag. (φύουσαι μυρεψικά) in reading the part. מְגַדְּלוֹת. The fem. plur. מִגְדְּלוֹת from מִגְדָּל is also attested by viii. 10. The custom of raising fragrant plants on mounds of earth of a pyramidal or high tower-like shape, receives sufficient confirmation from iv. 6 (the "mountain of myrrh" and the "hill of frankincense"). And the whole comparison appears to be entirely appropriate, if we but think of the beard on the chin and cheeks of her lover as not merely a soft down (Hitz.) but as a vigorous, finely cultivated and carefully arranged growth of hair. And in this we are justified in precise proportion as we rid ourselves of the notion of a youthful lover of the rank of a shepherd, and keep in view king Solomon in the maturity of middle life as the object of the description before us. Besides the circumstance that they were in the habit of perfuming the beard, as is still done to a considerable extent in the east (see Arvieux, R., p. 52; della Valle, II. 98; Harmer, Beobacht., II. 77, 83; Reiske on Tarafa, p. 46) may have contributed its share to the particular form of the comparison.—His lips lilies, dropping liquid myrrh.

Of course it is not white but red lilies, lilies of the color, denoted iv. 3 by the "crimson thread," to which the lips of her lover are here likened. The "dropping of liquid myrrh" (comp. on ver. 8) refers not to the lilies (SYR., ROSENM.) but directly to the lips. It serves to represent the lovely fragrance of the breath, which issues from her lips (comp vii. 9); for the "loveliness of his speech" (HENGSTENB., comp. TARG.) is not mentioned till ver. 16.

Ver. 14. His hands golden rods. Others, as COCCEI., GESEN., (Thesaur. p. 287), ROSENM., DÖPKE, VAIH., [so ENG. VER.], take גְּלִילֵי זָהָב to be gold rings, which they refer to the bent or closed hand, with allusion also to the finger-nails colored with alhenna as compared with the jewels of the rings. Very arbitrarily, because 1) the curved or hollow hand must necessarily have been denoted by כַּף; 2) the proper expression for ring would not have been גָּלִיל but חוֹתָם or טַבַּעַת; 3) מְמֻלָּאִים could no more express the idea of being "set with anything," than turquoises standing with it could yield a figure even remotely appropriate for yellow-stained finger nails. גָּלִיל is rather roller, cylinder, rod, and the expression "golden rods" is applied primarily to the individual fingers with reference to their reddish lustre and finely rounded shape (comp. ver. 11 a) and then by synecdoche to the hands consisting of the fingers.*—Encased in turquoises. Whatever precious stone may be intended by תַּרְשִׁישׁ, whether the chrysolite of the ancients (see SEPTUAG., Ex. xxviii. 17; xxxix. 13) which seems to answer to our topaz; or what is now called the turquoise (a light-blue semi-precious stone); or the onyx, which HITZIG proposes (though this was called שֹׁהַם Gen. ii. 12, etc.), it is at all events in bad taste to understand by this encasing of the fingers in costly jewels anything but actual jewel ornaments with which his hands glittered, agreeably to the well-known custom in the ancient East of wearing many rings. (Comp. WINER, Realwörterb., ART., "Ringe" and "Siegelring"). The nails in and of themselves differed too little in color and lustre from the fingers and hands as a whole, to admit of their being compared with precious stones; and staining them with alhenna (comp. on i. 14) if practised at all in the time of Solomon, was most likely a custom restricted to women and which could scarcely have been likewise in use amongst men. On מִלֵּא in the sense of "encasing" (lit., to fill in the encasement or enclosure) comp. Ex. xxviii. 17; xxxi. 5; xxxv. 33. "Golden rods encased in turquoise" or "with turquoise" are properly such rods filled into the body of jewels here named i. e. surrounded and glittering with them (comp. WEISSB. in loc.).—His body a figure of ivory, veiled with sapphires. מֵעָיו here, where the exterior parts of the body only are enumerated, is certainly not "his bowels, his inwards" (HENGSTENBERG), but "his body," comp. vii. 8, as well as Dan. ii. 32, where מְעִים also stands as a synonym of בֶּטֶן. It is only the pure white and the smooth appearance of the body, i. e. of the trunk generally, including the breast, thighs, etc., which can be intended by the comparison with an עֶשֶׁת שֵׁן a "figure of ivory" (עֶשֶׁת sing. of עֶשְׁתּוֹת [but see GESEN. Lex. s. v.—TR.] forms, thoughts, Job xii. 5), a comparison in which that ivory work of art restored by Solomon according to 1 Kin. x. 18 may have been before the mind of the speaker. The sapphires veiling the statue are naturally a figure of the dress of sapphire-blue or better still of the dress confined by a splendid girdle studded with sapphires. On the latter assumption the apparent "unsuitableness of the comparison" vanishes, which certainly would have to be admitted (HITZ.) if the sapphire referred to the azure color of the dress. For it would evidently be too far-fetched, with VAIH. to refer the sapphire to the "blue veins appearing through the splendid white skin of the body," and this would neither comport with the deep blue color of the sapphire or lapis lazuli, nor with the expression "veiled, covered (מְעֻלֶּפֶת) with sapphires."—There is accordingly an indirect proof of the royal rank and condition of Shulamith's lover in the representations of this verse likewise, especially in its allusions to the ornaments of precious stones on the hands and about the waist of the person described.

Ver. 15. His legs columns of white marble. The figure of an elegant statue is here continued with little alteration. To understand the שׁוֹקַיִם simply of the lower part of the legs and to assume that Shulamith omits to mention the יְרֵכַיִם i. e. the upper part of the legs from a fine sense of decorum (HITZ.) is inadmissible, because שׁוֹקַיִם according to passages like Prov. xxvi. 7; Isa. xlvii. 2 appears to include the upper part of the leg, whilst יְרֵכַיִם according to Gen. xxiv. 2; Ex. xxviii. 42; Dan. ii. 32, etc., denotes rather the loins or that part of the body where the legs begin to separate. Further, the mention of the legs and just before of the body could only be regarded as unbecoming or improper by an overstrained prudishness, because the description which is here given avoids all libidinous details and is so strictly general as not even to imply that she had ever seen the parts of the body in question in a nude condition. It merely serves to complete the delineation of her lover, which Shulamith sketches by a gradual descent from head to foot, and moreover is to be laid to the account of the poet rather than to that of Shulamith, who is in every thing else so chaste and delicate in her feelings.—The legs are compared with "white marble" (שֵׁשׁ) principally on account of

* [THRUPP: "His hands are folding panels of gold. The word גליל is applied, as we learn from 1 Kings vi. 34, to the separate portions of a folding door; the doors to the holy of holies consisted of two leaves, each of which in its turn consisted of two halves or folds. There is no passage in which the word denotes a 'ring;' nor would this meaning be here so appropriate. The image is that of a door, not necessarily a large door, constructed in four or five separate folds, corresponding to the appearance presented by the hand when the fingers, while kept in contact with each other, are stretched at full length."] the lustrous color of their skin, not with reference to their solidity; for an Arabic poet (AMRU B KELTH., Moal. ver. 18) pictures even the legs of a girl as "pillars of marble and ivory;" and the figure of the marble column is also employed in a like sense by Greek poets and mythographers (comp. VAIH. in loc.). Set on bases of fine gold, viz., on the feet which are here named as the bases or pedestals of the columns (their יְסוֹד) without however going into any further description of them.* His aspect like Lebanon. מַרְאֶה not synonymous with קוֹמָה "stature" (vii. 8), but denoting his entire appearance, his whole figure and bearing comp. ii. 14. By this comparison with Lebanon his figure is characterized as majestically tall and impressive, comp. Jer. xlvi. 18. There is probably no allusion to the "lordly look" which Lebanon bestows upon his beholders (vs. ROSENM., MAGN.), and still less likelihood of a reference to the roots of the mountain penetrating deeply and extending widely in the earth as analogous to the "roots of her lover's feet." Job xiii. 27; Hos. xiv. 6 (vs. HITZ.).—Choice as the cedars; that is, stately and majestic as these giant trees which crown the summit of Lebanon.

Ver. 16. His palate (is) sweets. חֵךְ is not the mouth for kissing (MAGN., BÖTTCH.) but the palate as an organ of speech, as in Job vi. 30; xxxi. 30; Prov. v. 3; viii. 7. HITZ. correctly: "It is speech which first betrays that the beautiful body described vers. 10–15 has a soul;" whilst WEISSB. in asserting that the palate is here regarded as an organ of breathing like the lips ver. 13, fails to perceive this advance from the corporeal to the spiritual and creates an unhandsome repetition. On the figure comp. Prov. xvi. 21; xxvii. 9.—And he is altogether precious. כֻּלּוֹ "all of him" combines in one the sum total of the ten corporeal excellencies enumerated in vers. 11–15 together with the last named endowment of a spiritual nature, and thus completes the portrait of her lover, whereupon there follows the general reference to the preceding description: "This is my beloved, and this my friend, ye daughters of Jerusalem."

5. CONCLUSION. c. THE QUESTION WHERE HER LOVER IS AND SHULAMITH'S ANSWER. VI. 1–3.

Ver. 1. Whither has thy beloved gone, etc. As in what precedes Shulamith had made no distinct declaration respecting the person of her lover, but only given an ideal description of his beauty, the women might still remain uncertain who and where he was. Hence this additional question, which like that in v. 9 is a question of curiosity and expresses some such sense as this: If then thy lover is a person of such extraordinary elegance and beauty, how could he have suffered you to be away from him? how could he have permitted you to become the wife of another so that you now must pine after him and seek longingly for him? At all events that particular in Shulamith's story of her dream, according to which her lover "had turned away, was gone," v. 6, determined the form of their question. The women may have thought that they perceived in this the echo of an actual occurrence, a sudden desertion of Shulamith by her former lover. Manifestly no one of them thought of Solomon as the object of her languishing and painful desire.

Ver. 2. My beloved has gone down to his garden, to the beds of balm. This answer of Shulamith is certainly evasive, but scarcely jesting and roguish (HITZ.); it is rather sadly ironical. She does not seriously mean to represent Solomon as actually occupied with working in the garden or with rural pleasures (as DEL. supposes). She merely intends to intimate that other matters seem more pressing and important to him than intercourse with her, his chosen love, and with this view she makes use of those pastoral and agricultural (horticultural) tropes, with which she is most conversant and most entirely at home (comp. i. 7, 14; ii. 3, 16, etc.) It is further probable that "going down to the beds of balm" and "gathering lilies" may contain an allusion to amorous intercourse meanwhile indulged with others of his wives; and with this the primarily apologetic drift of her whole statement, which is purposely figurative and ambiguous, might very well consist. What Shulamith here says can in no event refer to a lover of the rank of a shepherd; for it would be trifling and in bad taste to attribute to him in that case besides his main business of feeding his flock, that of being engaged with beds of balm and other objects belonging to the higher branches of gardening (comp. WEISSB. in loc.) and to explain the "garden" in the sense of iv. 12–15 (that is, of Shulamith herself, as the locked garden, which her country lover had now come to Jerusalem to visit) must be regarded as the extreme of exegetical subtilty, and can neither be brought into harmony with the verb יָרַד "has gone down" (for which we would then rather expect עָלָה "has come up"), nor with the plur. בַּגַּנִּים "in the gardens" (vs. HITZ., BÖTTCH., REN.).

Ver. 3. I am my beloved's, etc.—The partial transposition of the words as compared with ii. 16 is not due to chance, but is an intentional alteration: comp. iv. 2 with vi. 6; ii. 17 with viii. 14.—The connexion of the exclamation before us with ver. 2 is given by HITZIG with substantial correctness: "The words of ver. 2 are a rebuff to strangers concerning themselves about her lover; the averment in ver. 3 that they belong to one another, indirectly excludes a third, and is thus inwardly connected with ver. 2." With which it must nevertheless be kept in view that this present assertion is not made without, at the same time, feeling a certain pain at the infidelity of one so purely and tenderly beloved.*—

* (BURROWES: "These doubtless refer to the beauty of his sandals;" so GOOD, TAYLOR, WILLIAMS and others. This seems to be the better explanation notwithstanding GINSBURG's objection: "That it refers to his feet and not to his sandals is evident from vers. 11 and 14, where the head and the hands, the visible parts of the body, are described as golden; and it is but natural that the feet, the only remaining exposed parts, should also be described as golden.")

* [This is certainly a most extraordinary comment upon language which manifestly expresses nothing but the most entire confidence in Solomon's unabated attachment to herself while it reaffirms her own undivided attachment to him. The inconstancy of the bridegroom, which ZÖCKLER's preconceived scheme obliges him to assume, is contradicted in express terms by this verse, converts ver. 2 into an unmeaning evasion instead of the frank statement, whether literal or

The remark made by DEL. on this verse cannot be substantiated: "With these words, impelled by love and followed by the daughters of Jerusalem (?), she continues on her way, hastening to the arms of her lover" (similarly too WEISSB.). The text does not contain the slightest intimation of such a departure of Shulamith to look for him, and a consequent change of scene. Comp. above, No. 2.

6. SECOND SCENE. a. SOLOMON'S REITERATED PRAISE OF THE BEAUTY OF SHULAMITH, vers. 4–10. The simplest view of this scene is that all to ver. 10 incl. is an encomium pronounced by the king, who has meanwhile entered, upon his beloved, but hitherto somewhat neglected and consequently saddened wife Shulamith, whilst vers. 11, 12 is spoken by her, and vii. 1 by her alternately with the chorus. And the following explanation of the details will show that this is on all accounts the most satisfactory. We must reject, therefore, the views of EWALD, who puts the whole, even the colloquy, vi. 11 to vii. 1, into the mouth of Solomon, and consequently assumes but one speaker; of HITZIG, who makes the ladies of the court retire and the "shepherd" enter and speak, ver. 9; of BÖTTCHER, who besides introduces the queen mother likewise as a speaker in the words "she is the only one of her mother, the choice of her that bare her" (ver. 9 a); of UMBREIT, who takes ver. 10 to be the question of the poet, vers. 11 ff. the language of Shulamith walking sadly about in the king's nut garden; of MAGNUS, who breaks up the whole section into no less than five fragments, etc.

Ver. 4. Fair art thou, my dear, as Tirzah, comely as Jerusalem.—תִּרְצָה Tirzah ("delightful;" also the name of a woman, Numb. xxvi. 33, in the passage before us rendered εὐδοκία by the SEPT.) is certainly the subsequent residence of the kings in the northern kingdom, yet not here named as such along with Jerusalem, but as a remarkably beautiful and charming town in northern Palestine. Its mere name cannot possibly have afforded the reason of its being mentioned. It is much more likely that its location not far from Shunem (according to HITZ., in the territory of Issachar, the tribe of Baasha?) may have had some influence, since Solomon is elsewhere particularly fond of comparing his beloved with localities in the region of her home (iv. 1, 8, 11, 15; vii. 5, 6). Comp. moreover Introduction, § 3, Rem. 1.—The site of ancient Tirzah is no longer accurately known. K. FURRER, Wanderungen, etc., p. 241, thinks that he saw it not far from Sichem (to the north of it and due west of Samaria), "on a charming green hill, part of which has a very steep descent;" but he has probably taken a locality considerably to the south for the ruins of the old royal city, probably Thulluza (three hours east of Shomron, one hour north of Mount Ebal), so explained also by ROBINSON. Comp. HERGT, Palästina, p. 410; L. VOELTER, Art. "Thirza," in ZELLER'S Bibl. Wörterbuch, and WINER, in Realwörterbuch.—Jeremiah also speaks of Jerusalem's comeliness, Lam. ii. 15.—HENGSTENB. makes the poet rise from Tirzah to Jerusalem as a still grander city; but this is contradicted by the fact that the predicate נָאוָה "comely," as appears from i. 5 compared with i. 8, is inferior to יָפָה "fair."—Terrible as bannered hosts.—אָיֹם from the same stem with אֵימָה "terror," is used Hab. i. 7 to designate the Chaldeans as a dreadful foe, and here, therefore, can only designate the person addressed as fearful, terrible, as is especially evident from the comparison with "armies" or "bannered hosts."—But why is Shulamith here said to be "terrible as bannered hosts" (which is only further unfolded in what follows, "turn away thine eyes from me, for they assault me")? Not because she was to be represented in a general way as triumphant over men, whose hearts she wounds and captivates by her glances, (GESEN.); much more likely, because she has exerted upon Solomon in particular, her ardent lover, a fearful power by those eyes of hers, which pierce the heart and vanquish all resistance (EW., DÖPKE, DELITZSCH, and the great body of interpreters); but most likely of all because it was from those marvellously beautiful eyes a grave reproachful look had fallen upon him, because he had felt himself, as it were, called to account and chastised by the awe-inspiring innocence and purity of her look. HITZ. is substantially correct, only he makes the "chastising look" proceed from Shulamith still unmarried, who from love to her young shepherd acts coldly towards the king in his addresses. This explanation cannot be invalidated by the fact that the predicate "terrible as bannered hosts" recurs ver. 10 below, as the language of the ladies of the court, quoted by Solomon;* for in this quotation Solomon uses great freedom, as is shown by the extravagant comparisons with the sun, moon, and dawn of the morning (see in loc.).

Ver. 5. Turn away thine eyes from me, for they have taken me by storm.—By this must be substantially meant, as appears from the context, an influence proceeding from Shulamith's serious looks to the heart of her conscience-smitten husband, by which he was awed and abashed (comp. the parallels adduced by HITZ. from the Syr. and Arab. for the sense of terrifying), not the exciting of love to a passion-figurative, which it plainly is, and imputes a meaning to ver. 1 which the words certainly do not contain, and which no one who was not pressed by the exigencies of a theory would ever imagine that he found there. If the unsuccessful search for her lover, which Shulamith reports, v. 6, 7, was only a troubled dream, it can create no surprise that in her waking moments she knows and is able to state in the general whither her beloved had gone, even if she were not certain in what particular spot in his extensive gardens he was then to be found. The allegorical sense commonly put upon these verses will appear sufficiently from the following citations: "Jerusalem being on an hill, they went down to the gardens; so Christ comes down from heaven spiritually into the congregation." WESTMINSTER ANNOTATIONS. "The garden which had been described in iv. 12—v. 1. The 'garden' refers to the Christian body in its unity, the 'gardens' denote its manifoldness; in the New Testament we read, as THEODORET remarks, alike of the Church and of the churches. Under the dispensation of the gospel, no less than under that of the older covenant, Christ nurtures His people in the purity of holiness. But He now not only feeds His flock among lilies, but also gathers lilies; gathers with joy and acceptance from His people those fruits of holiness which through the grace of His Spirit they are continually bringing forth." THRUPP.—TR.]

* [This can scarcely be characterized in any other way than as carrying a theory through regardless of difficulties which the plain words of the text may interpose. The expression "terrible as armies with banners" cannot mean one thing here and a different thing in ver. 10. As GOOD correctly remarks: "The artillery of the eyes is an idea common to poets of every nation." Comp. ANACREON, Od. ii., xvi.; MUSÆUS, Hero et Leander.—TR.]

ate ardor (DÖPKE), nor bewitching (VAIHINGER), nor manifesting her resistless and victorious power over her lover (DELITZSCH), etc.—Thy hair is like a flock of goats, etc. Comp. iv. 1 b. On ver. 6 comp. iv. 2. On ver. 7 comp. iv. 3 b. The omission in this passage* of the description of the lips and tongue contained in iv. 3 a, is simply to be explained from the abridged character of the present delineation, which is, as it were, but an abstract of the preceding, and since it was enough simply to remind his beloved of the encomiums passed upon her on her wedding day, might fitly be restricted to bare hints or a summary recapitulation. The opinion of HENGSTENBERG and WEISSBACH, that the number four is maintained as characteristic of the form of this abridged description, as the number ten in the larger one, imputes too whimsical a design to the poet. Far too artificial also HITZIG: The omission of iv. 3 a is to intimate "a brief pause" in the vain endeavors of the king to gain over the coy Shulamith, whereupon the voluptuous sensualist and inconstant "butterfly" suddenly breaks off after ver. 7, bethinking himself that there are other damsels yet (Iliad ix. 395 f.), and accordingly leaving the scene with the words, "Well, I have sixty queens and eighty concubines," etc, to make love, soon after (vii. 2 ff.) to another(!).

Ver. 8. There are sixty queens and eighty concubines, etc. That this exclamation is not "uttered aside," and indicative of the sudden breaking of the thread of the king's patience, who has thus far been vainly laboring with Shulamith (according to HITZIG's view, just stated), incontrovertibly appears, from its close connection with ver. 9, which nothing but the extreme of arbitrary criticism can sunder from it, and put into the mouth of the "shepherd." Accordingly, even RENAN has not ventured to approve HITZIG's separation of ver. 9 from ver. 8, but has assigned both verses to the shepherd, who interrupts the king by singing them "from without!" But how could the praise of the "one dove," the "one perfect," etc., contained in ver. 9, come from any other mouth than that which uttered the encomium upon the beauty of the king's beloved, beginning ver. 4! And again, how else could the way be prepared for the emphatic declaration: "My dove is one," etc., but by this glance at the great number of the queens, concubines and virgins, who were all at the rich king's command, but all of whom he was ready to subordinate to that one! It is plain that one verse here sustains the other, and they are all to ver. 10 inclusive most intimately connected together like links in a chain, which cannot be broken. This has been seen by the majority even of the advocates of the shepherd-hypothesis, without their finding anything better here after all than a "last violent assault" upon Shulamith's innocence (Ew.), or a "new and heightened piece of flattery" (VAIH.), or a "thought adapted to win the heart and ensnare the refined feelings of Shulamith" (BÖTTCH.), etc. On the relation of the numbers here given, "sixty queens" and "eighty concubines" of Solomon to the seven hundred queens and three hundred concubines, as stated (1 Kin. xi. 3, see Introduc., § 3, p. 12). The passage before us evidently contains a statement referable to an earlier period in Solomon's life, which must as surely have been correct for some fixed point of time (which it is true cannot now be accurately ascertained), as the much larger numbers of the book of Kings are to be reckoned historically accurate for Solomon's latest and most degenerate years.* For there is just as little necessity really for discrediting them as "very large statements in round numbers" (HITZIG), as there is for the attempt to bring out an approximate adjustment with the lower statements of this passage, by the change of 700 to 70, and of 300 to 30 (comp. THENIUS on 1 Kin. in loc.). The accounts of ancient writers, as PLUTARCH (Artax. c. 27), CURTIUS (III. 3, 24), ATHENÆUS (Deipnos. III. 1), respecting the size of the harem of the later Persian monarchs (e. g., Artaxerxes Mnemon had 360 παλλακίδες; Darius Codomannus was accompanied by 360 pellices on his march against Alexander, etc.) are analogies, which, rightly weighed, make rather in favor of than against the credibility of the book of Kings in this matter. And although the harems of modern oriental rulers are often stated to be considerably smaller, so that e. g., Shah Sefi of Persia, according to OLEARIUS, had but three wives and three hundred concubines, Sultan Abdul Medjid, of Constantinople, something over three hundred and fifty wives, etc., these accounts of a very recent period prove nothing respecting the customs and relations of a hoary antiquity. The seven hundred and three hundred of the book of Kings, as well as the sixty and eighty of this passage, may indeed be round numbers. This is favored to some extent in the former case by the circumstance that the total amounts to precisely one thousand, and in the latter by the popular and proverbial use of the numbers six, sixty (comp. CIC. Verrin. I. c. 125), six hundred (Ex. xiv. 7; Judg. xviii. 11; 1 Sam. xxvii. 2, and the well-known use of the lat. sexcenti). But both these numerical statements must at all events pass for approximately exact; and neither the hypothesis that 1 Kings, loc. cit. states the entire number of all the wives, both principal and subordinate, that Solomon had in succession (so e. g. KEIL in loc.), nor the opinion that the "virgins without number" may afford the means of adjusting the difference between them, seems to be admissible. Against the latter resource even HITZIG remarks: "The above difference cannot be reconciled by means of the עלמות virgins; for these plainly constitute a third class, and one outside of the harem"—that is to say, merely maids of the court, attendants upon the harem, whom the king, if he had chosen, might likewise have exalted to be concubines. On HENGSTENBERG's allegorical explanation, according to which the "household of the heavenly Solomon" is here depicted, and consequently sixty and eighty = one hundred and forty, is to be taken as a mystical number,* see Introduction, p. 31.

* At least according to the Masoretic text; though the SEPTUAG. insert the words iv. 3 a (Ὡς σπαρτίον κόκκινον χείλη σου, καὶ ἡ λαλιά σου ὡραία) here too in their proper place (between vers. 6 and 7). [But gratuitous insertions from parallel passages are too frequent in the SEPTUAGINT to warrant the suspicion of an omission from the currently received text].

* [WESTMINSTER ANNOTATIONS: "It seems that Solomon writ this book of Canticles before he had his full number of wives; for he had many more after." PATRICK (followed by WILLIAMS, SCOTT and HENRY) supposes allusion not to Solomon's own wives, but to those of other princes, for the reason that "it is not at all likely that he had so many as are there mentioned, while his mind was filled with such divine raptures as these." FRY fancies that he finds here an argument for the idyllic hypothesis: "The passage before us contains a tacit intimation that though King Solomon's name and King Solomon's pen were made use of by the divine Inspirer of these Canticles to construct an allegory representative of the loves of Christ and His Church, very different loves from those of Solomon must be imagined as the archetype, even when in the exterior of the allegory, circumstances of royalty and circumstances connected with the Israelitish monarch are supposed. And it is for the same reason that though King Solomon is the undoubted author of these songs, he so frequently disrobes himself of his royal character, and speaks in the person of a shepherd, or leads us to contemplate some faithful pair in the humbler ranks of life"].

Ver. 9. My dove, my perfect is one, comp. on v. 2. The opinion that אֲחֹתִי "my sister," which stands with יוֹנָתִי תַמָּתִי "my dove, my perfect" in the parallel passage v. 2, can have influenced the selection of אַחַת "one" in this place, is very improbable (vs. WEISSB.).—The only one of her mother, the choice one of her that bare her. It follows, from the subsequent mention of Shulamith's little sister, viii. 8, that the predicate "only" here (as in Prov. iv. 3) is not to be taken literally, but in the tropical sense of "incomparable." On the combination of "mother" and "she that bare her," iii. 4, viii. 5. On the clause generally, Prov. iv. 8.—Daughters saw her and called her blessed, queens and concubines and they praised her. On the sentence comp. Prov. xxxi. 28, probably a free imitation of this passage. The "daughters" evidently correspond to the עֲלָמוֹת "virgins," ver. 8, as also the "queens and concubines" of that verse recur here, that they may expressly subordinate themselves to Shulamith, who is preferred above them. On account of this exact correspondence between this clause and ver. 8, it is incomprehensible how HITZ. can regard ver. 9 as spoken by the shepherd. Whence could he know that Solomon's queens and concubines had such an opinion of Shulamith? And how unnatural and far-fetched would such a remark about the uniqueness and all-surpassing loveliness of his beloved appear as the first exclamation of the shepherd immediately upon his coming to her! In the course of his familiar conversation with her he might appropriately say something of the sort, but not as the first word of his salutation.

Ver. 10. Who is this that looks forth like the dawn? If these words, like the exclamations iii. 6 and viii. 5, which likewise begin with מִי־זֹאת "who is this," had really been the opening of a new scene (as ROSENM., DÖPKE, HEILIGST., DEL., VAIH., WEISSB., etc., maintain, either supposing Solomon, or his courtiers and attendants, or the ladies of the court to be the speakers) they would have been preceded by a concluding formula like iii. 5 and viii. 4. Instead of this ver. 9 rather required to be further explained and supplemented in regard to Shulamith's being praised and pronounced blessed by Solomon's wives; a statement was still needed of what the אִשֵּׁר 'blessing' and הִלֵּל 'praising' of those women amounted to. And the thing of all others best adapted to this purpose, was a mention of that admiring praise, which according to iii. 6 ff. the ladies of the court bestowed upon Shulamith on her entry into Zion upon her wedding day. To this panegyric, of which he must have had mediate or immediate cognizance, Solomon here refers, though only in the way of inexact suggestion not of faithful reproduction (substantially correct EW., B. HIRZEL, BÖTTCH., HITZ.).—הַנִּשְׁקָפָה lit. "looking down, gazing down" from a high position: comp. שָׁקַף in Judg. v. 28; Ps. xiv. 2; liii. 3; cii. 20; Lam. iii. 50. Reference is thus made to the prominent or exalted place occupied by Shulamith in the world of women. She outshines all others like the early dawn, which looks from heaven over the mountains down to the earth. Yes, like the sun and moon! Dawn, moon and sun are here, therefore, personified as it were, like the sun in i. 6 above. Fair as the moon, pure as the sun. בָּרָה here equivalent to spotless, bright-shining, comp. Ps. xix. 9; and on the silvery moon as an image of superior purity and beauty Job xxv. 5; xxxi. 26. Arabic poets also sometimes compare female beauty with the brightness of the moon e. g. Hamasa (ed. SCHULTENS, p. 483.) "Then Lamisa appeared like the moon of heaven when it shines;" MOTANEBBI (Translation by VON HAMMER, p. 29, 42, etc.) and others, comp. DÖPKE and MAGN. in loc.)* The poetic expressions לְבָנָה "white" and חַמָּה "hot" for moon and sun, which are again combined in Isa. xxiv. 23, are particularly suited for the comparison, because they are both feminine and alike indicative of white and blazing radiance.—Terrible as bannered hosts. This concluding simile points to the identity of the person intended with the one described in ver. 4, and at the same time testifies to the identity of the speaker and against the sundering of this verse from the preceding.†

7. CONTINUATION. b. SHULAMITH AND THE LADIES OF THE COURT, VI. 11—VII. 1.

* [THRUPP gives a different view from the allegorical standpoint: "As regards the sixty and the eighty, we have of course in each case a definite number for an indefinite. The choice of the particular numbers seems to have been mainly dictated by a studied avoidance of the number seventy, to which a certain sacredness and completeness would have attached. It is no harmonious covenant-relationship, in which the queens and concubines stand to Christ: all is with them imperfect and wide of the mark. A directly opposite view is erroneously taken by HENGSTENBERG." WORDSWORTH exhibits the Archdeacon of Westminster in his comment: "The concubines are more numerous than the queens. May not this perhaps signify that the number of the members of sectarian congregations would be greater than that of the Church?" He had before remarked upon the fourscore concubines: "A state of things is here represented when schisms prevail in Christendom. The concubines represent Christian congregations which have some spiritual gifts and graces, but are not perfectly joined to Christ in the unity of the one faith and apostolic fellowship"].

* Here too belong the verses from THEOCRITUS, Id. xviii. 26 ff.

"Ἀὼς ἀντέλλοισα καλὸν διέφαινε πρόσωπον,
Πότνια νὺξ ἅτε, λευκὸν ἔαρ χειτῶνος ἀνέντος,
Ὧδε καὶ ἁ χρυσέα Ἑλένα διεφαίνετ' ἐν ἁμῖν."

†[DOWAY note: "Here is a beautiful metaphor describing the church from the beginning. 'As the morning rising,' signifying the church before the written law; 'fair as the moon,' showing her under the written law of Moses; 'bright as the sun,' under the light of the gospel; and 'terrible as an army,' the power of Christ's church against its enemies."]

Some recent commentators take this particularly difficult little section to be a narration by Shulamith of something which she had previously experienced, in which she also repeats the language of others to her, together with her answer (HITZ., MEIER, etc.); NAEGELSB. (in REUTER'S Repert. 1852, No. 10) on the contrary regards it as a reverie of Shulamith, in which she foreshadows to herself her reception by her country friends on her expected return to them; EW. (and HAHN) a continuation of the discourse of Solomon, in which a colloquy between Shulamith and the ladies of the royal court is repeated; the majority of both the older and the later expositors, however, make of it an independent dialogue between Shulamith and the "daughters of Jerusalem," in which the verses vi. 11, 12 together with the words "what do you see in Shulamith" in vii. 1 are assigned to the former, and the remainder of vii. 1, to the latter. This last understanding of it is the only one which avoids the manifold difficulties and forced explanations with which each of those previously mentioned is chargeable.

Ver. 11. To the nut-garden I went down. According to the various interpretations put upon the entire section, these words are thought to contain either 1) Shulamith's answer to what is supposed to be the wondering question of the ladies of the court in ver. 10 (so DEL. and WEISSB.: she states to her noble auditors in these words not so much who she is, as why she had come down to the king's garden); or 2) the beginning of an account of what happened to her on the occasion of her being first brought to the king's court (EW., UMBR., HITZ., VAIH., BÖTTCH., REN. etc.—all agreeing in this that Shulamith here begins to tell the story of her former "abduction" to the king's harem); or 3) the beginning of a dreamy description of what Shulamith would do after her return home (NAEGELSB. loc. cit.) or 4) the beginning of a statement of the way in which the daughter of Zion attained the high dignity which the words of the heavenly Solomon had ascribed to her, especially in vers. 9 and 10, (HENGSTENB.); or 5) the beginning of a recital by Solomon, in which he prophetically depicts the process of the conversion of the gentiles to the God of Israel (HAHN) etc. We hold that of these views the second comes nearest to the true sense of the poet, but prefer to find in the words instead of a statement of what Shulamith was doing at the precise moment of her "abduction," a description of what she was in the habit of doing before she came to the royal court. We accordingly take יָרַדְתִּי neither as pluperf. ("I had gone down"), nor as a proper perfect, nor as an aorist, but as a statement of an action frequently repeated in the past, a customary action, in which sense though it elsewhere belongs rather to the future, the perfect is sometimes used in the O. T (e. g. 2 Sam. i. 22,) comp. EW. Lehrb. § 136, c.—If, therefore, Shulamith commences in this way to describe her rural occupations prior to her exaltation as queen, she thereby gives her husband plainly enough to understand that he has in no wise satisfied her by his enthusiastic laudations and admiring declarations of love, but that she now longed more than ever to get away from his voluptuous court and from the vicinity of his sixty queens and eighty concubines to the green little nut garden, the fresh valleys and the lovely vineyards in the region of her home.—גִּנַּת אֱגוֹז denotes according to all the versions as well as to ancient Talmudic tradition a "nut garden," a meaning for which there is the less need to substitute "kitchen-herb or vegetable garden" (with HITZ.) since אֱגוֹז is doubtless the same word with the Pers. ghuz and JOSEPHUS Bell. Jud. III. 10, 8, expressly testifies to the occurrence of nut-trees in the region of the lake of Tiberias, not far consequently from Shulamith's home. The nut-garden here mentioned is to be sought in this her native region and not in the neighborhood of Jerusalem or within the range of the king's gardens. It can scarcely be different from the vineyards and orchards described vii. 13 ff. in the immediate vicinity of the house of Shulamith's mother.—To look at the shrubs of the valley, etc. The garden itself probably lay likewise in this valley-bottom, or at all events considerably lower than Shulamith's residence (hence ירד "went down"). "Shrubs" or "green" of the valley (אִבֵּי הַנָּחַל) probably denotes whatever verdure sprouted up in the place where the water of the Wady had run off, less likely the green of proper water-plants (Job viii. 12). On the combination of verdure or shrubs, vines and pomegranates comp. ii. 12, f. the like juxtaposition of flowers, fig trees and vines. רָאָה בְּ "to look at anything" denotes, as it invariably does, the pleased, gratified contemplation of an object (comp. Ps. xxvii. 4, lxiii. 3; Mic. iv. 11, etc.) not the busy looking for something, for which latter sense not even Gen. xxxiv. 1 can be adduced (vs. HITZ.).

Ver. 12. I knew it not, my desire brought me, etc. The thing intended is scarcely her "desire to walk out in the open air" (EW.), or her "curiosity" (VAIH.), or her "wish to see the vine sprout" (HITZIG), but much more probably her desire to belong to her royal lover, her longing to be wholly and for ever her beloved's. When and how this desire was first awakened in her, she does not here state; she had given utterance to this in another place, see ii. 8-17. In the passage before us she simply assumes the existence of her desire and longing for her lover, and only tells how little she knew or imagined in the midst of those rural occupations of hers (ver. 11) that she was exalted by it "to the chariots of her people, the noble," in other words, how little she suspected beforehand that her lover was the king, the ruler of all Israel.—To the chariots of my people, the noble. מַרְכְּבוֹת strictly denotes merely "wagons," but here, like the combination "horses and chariots" in other passages (Deut. xx. 1; Isa. xxxi. 1; Ps. xx. 8) seems to express the idea of the full display of the power and pomp of the kingdom, but without suggesting anything of a military nature, so that as in 1 Sam. viii. 11; 2 Sam. xv. 1 we are to think chiefly of state carriages in the festive processions of the king and his court. Being transferred or promoted to these chariots of state would accordingly be tantamount to elevation to royal dignity and glory, of which the analogy of Joseph in Egypt is an instructive instance, Gen. xli. 43 ff. So far as the language is concerned, there is no special objection to this interpretation. The connection of the accusative מַרְכְּבוֹת with the verb שׂוּם without a preposition most probably expresses the idea of "removing or bringing in the direction (comp. Isa. xl. 26; Dan. xi. 2; or into the vicinity of something." (comp. Judg. xi. 29); this is the case not merely with verbs denoting motion, but with all possible verbal ideas (see numerous examples in Ew., § 281, d). שׂוּם is often elsewhere synonymous with הֵבִיא "to bring or conduct to any place" (comp. Gen. ii. 8) and so שׂוּם מַרְכְּבוֹת may very readily mean: "to bring to the chariots, to transfer, exalt into the sphere or region of the chariots"—a meaning which is at all events more obvious than the rendering "to set me on the chariots" (Syr., Del., etc.); or than the explanation of Velth., Gesen., Ew., Böttch., Hitz., Ren., etc.: "made me happen among the chariots" (viz., of the royal retinue); or than the strange rendering of the Vulg., which probably presupposes the reading שִׁמְּתַנִי instead of שָׂמַתְנִי "conturbavit me propter quadrigas," etc.; or finally than construing מַרְכְּבוֹת as a second object, either in the sense of "making me or converting me into chariots," i. e., "a princess" (Umbr.) or "a defence" (Hengstenb.); or "making like chariots, i. e., as swift as chariots" (Rosenm., Magn., Döpke). Since no one of these constructions appears to be better established in point of language than ours, while this latter undoubtedly yields a less forced and more attractive thought, we might with all confidence declare it to be the only one that was admissible, if it were not that the difficult limiting genitive עַמִּי נָדִיב "of my people, the noble," involves the real meaning of מַרְכְּבוֹת and consequently of the entire passage in an obscurity that can scarcely be cleared up. The translation "chariots of my people, the noble," or "chariots of my noble people," is on the whole the most satisfactory (the absence of the article before the adjective is of no consequence, comp. Gen. xliii. 14; Ps. cxliii. 10 [Green's Heb. Gram., § 249, 1, b]). The resulting sense cannot then be materially different from that of נְדִיבֵי עָם "nobles of the people" Ps. cxiii. 8 or נְדִיבֵי הָעָם Num. xxi. 18 (comp. נְדִיבֵי עַמִּים Ps. xlvii. 10) and will accordingly refer to the noble countrymen of Shulamith, to the proceres seu optimates gentis suæ; for the explanation "war-chariots of the people of the prince" (Weissb.) certainly has as much against it as the opinion that עַמִּי נָדִיב is one noun, either equivalent to "prince of the realm" (Vaih.) or = the well-known proper name Amminadab (Ex. vi. 23; Num. i. 7; Ruth iv. 19; 1 Chron. ii. 10; vi. 7, etc.). This last expedient, manifestly the most confusing of all, was already tried by the Sept., Symmach., Vulg., Luther (who has Amminadib instead of Amminadab), and after them by most of the older interpreters, especially the allegorizers, with whom it was, so to speak, a fixed dogma that Amminadab means the devil! But even if we shun such devious ways, the sense of the expression "transferred to the chariots of my noble people" remains obscure and ambiguous enough, and we can either assume that the "noble people" or "noble folk" "Edelvolk" (Ew.) was intended to denote the noble extraction of Israel, or the courtiers of Solomon, or the whole people as represented in the person of its prince (so substantially Del., comp. Vaih.). In all which, however, it still remains a question why the poet did not make Shulamith speak in so many terms of her elevation to the chariot or to the throne of her prince.—To complete as far as possible our enumeration of all that interpreters have made out of the crux before us, Weissbach's view of this verse may here be stated in conclusion. According to it "the words of ver. 12 in the mouth of the person, who had proposed the question ver. 10 (viz., a courtier, who had gazed with astonishment upon Shulamith in the garden) mean: I asked the question because I did not know that this brilliant and majestic spectacle was you; I had rather supposed that I saw the prince's army chariots before me!"—Hahn, too, thinks that the speaker of these words is not Shulamith but Solomon, who thus relates how, when filled with longing desire for a reunion with Japhetic gentilism, his soul suddenly and insensibly set him "on the chariots of his people as a prince."*

Chap. 7, Ver. 1. Come back, come back, Shulamith, etc. As according to our understanding of vers. 11 and 12 Shulamith expresses in them her longing for the simpler circumstances of her native region and speaks of her elevation to the king's throne as a distinction, which came to her without her knowledge, and contrary to her expectation, nothing is more natural than to conceive that she spoke this in a saddened and painfully excited mood, and

* [The simplest and most natural explanation of these words finds in them, as it is expressed by Wordsworth: "the cheerful alacrity and fervent affection of the bride flying on the wings of love" to the bridegroom. Moody Stuart: "In a moment her soul is carried away directly, irresistibly, rapidly toward her bridegroom and her king." Withington thus paraphrases: "I went into the garden; I walked among its shades; I surveyed its beauties; I remembered the owner, and my soul melted with rapture and love." Patrick makes a somewhat different application: "The meaning of this verse seems to be that the spouse hearing such high commendations of herself, both from the bridegroom and from the persons mentioned, ver. 10, with great humility saith, that she was not conscious to herself of such perfections (I did not know it, or I did not think so), but is excited thereby to make the greatest speed to endeavor to preserve this character he had given her." Percy and Good understand it of the bride's hesitation and irresolution after she had promised to meet her beloved in the garden. The latter states its meaning thus: "I was not aware of the timidity of my mind, which hurried me away from my engagement, when in the very act of adhering to it, with the rapidity of the chariot of Amminadib." Thrupp on the basis of 2 Kings ii. 12; xiii. 14: "The church had unconsciously and unexpectedly become the source and channel of victorious might to all the willing people of God. 'My soul,' she says, 'had made me.' It is the unshrinking and devoted zeal with which the church prosecutes the task set before her that makes her the rallying point for all who would join in the service of her Lord." Others attribute this language to the bridegroom. Thus Taylor and Williams: "The affections of the prince carried him to meet his love with the rapidity of a chariot." Burrowes, as Scott and Henry, finds in vers. 11–13 a statement of the feelings of the bridegroom during his temporary withdrawal. When he left his spouse, v. 6, it was "only to withdraw to his favorite place of resort in the garden;" where "almost unconsciously, ere he was aware, his soul was filled with the desire of meeting her again, a desire so strong that it would have carried him to her arms with the swiftness of the chariot of Amminadib." It is characteristic of Gill's exposition that in commenting on ver. 11 he proposes the question, Why are believers like nuts? and answers it under ten heads.]

to conjecture that her strong and painful feeling of home-sickness would be accompanied by a corresponding gesture. This gesture we must unquestionably suppose from the earnest and repeated call addressed to her by the ladies of the court "come back, turn back" (שׁוּבִי שׁוּבִי comp. Judg. v. 12) was that of intending to go away, to escape from the vicinity of the vicious court of the king, which had become offensive to her. She does not purpose to withdraw from the "king's garden" (Döpke, Delitzsch, etc.), in which besides she could scarcely have been at the time, but from the vicinity of the king altogether, who had greatly grieved her, and that of the ladies of his court, whose society she feels that she must henceforth avoid. Hence it is that the latter (for it is to them that Shulamith's answer "what do you see in Shulamith?" is directed) call to her, entreating her to turn again and permit them still to look upon her charming person. For this is the only sense in which וְנֶחֱזֶה בָּךְ "that we may look upon thee" not materially different from רָאָה בְּ (חָזָה בְּ vi. 11) can be taken, viz.: that of beholding with delight, feasting the eyes upon her to whom they had long before accorded the praise of beauty (comp. their frequent form of address, "fairest among women," i. 8; v. 9; vi. 1). That it is the ladies of the court, who address to her this summons to return and remain, and not Solomon (whom many of the older commentators regard as the speaker in these words, see Starke), is either to be explained by Solomon's uniting in the call of the women (comp. Döpke, Ewald, etc.), or better still by the assumption that he who was more affected than all others by her attempt to go away, does more than barely call her back, he seeks by loving force to detain her; and hence, speechless with passionate emotion, he first embraces and holds her, that he may afterwards fetter her by the fondest adulation* (ver. 2 ff.).—What do you see in Shulamith? This question asked by the party addressed is doubtless to be understood as modestly declining the praise indirectly bestowed upon her beauty in thus calling her. Shulamith wishes to be no longer looked at and admired by such people as Solomon's concubines and the ladies of his court; this has become oppressive to her. The humility of her entire question certainly characterizes also her designation of herself בַּשּׁוּלַמִּית (lit., "in the Shulamitess," i. e. not "in this Shulamitess" but "in one who is a Shulamitess;" comp. 1 Kin. xx. 36; Isa. vii. 14; Joel iv. 3, etc.). Its meaning is certainly no other than "why do you look at me, a plain country girl (Hitzig)? what you see in the simple daughter of a Galilean village?" הַשּׁוּלַמִּית is, as the article shows both here and where it was used in the vocative, certainly not the proper name of a person (so most of the ancient versions and interpreters); no more is it an adjective meaning "favored, treated with kindness" (Weissb.), but a gentile noun, synonymous with הַשּׁוּנַמִּית 1 Kin. i. 3; 2 Kin. iv. 12, 25, of which it is only a dialectic variation; it is accordingly a designation of the person in question from שׁוּלֵם or שׁוּנֵם, the place of her abode.* This place, the Σουλήμ of Eusebius and Jerome in his Onomast. and the modern Sôlam appears to have received its name, which originally may have been = סֻלָּם "ladder," on account of its location on a steep mountain declivity (comp. Robinson, Pal. II. 234), just as many other mountains, e. g. that mentioned 1 Mac. xi. 59 bear the name Κλίμαξ (comp. Hitzig in loc. and "Urgeschichte der Philister," p. 126). According to Josh. xix. 18 this Shunem was situated in the tribe of Issachar, according to 1 Sam. xxviii. 4; xxix. 1, 11; xxxi. 1 not far from Mount Gilboa and the plain of Jezreel, according to 2 Kin. iv. 22–25 not very remote from Mount Carmel (comp. on ver. 6 of this chapter, and above on ii. 8; iii. 6; iv. 1, 8; also the Introduction, p. 6). As the dance of Mahanaim. Some interpreters after the example of the Vulg. ("quid videbis in Sulamite, nisi choros castrorum?") connect the difficult words כִּמְחֹלַת הַמַּחֲנָיִם with the question "why will ye look upon Shulamith, as one looks upon the dance of Mahanaim?" (Hahn, Weissb., Renan, etc.,) or "as at the dance of M." (Hitzig). But it seems more natural and better suited to the context with the majority of both the older and more recent commentators, to regard these words as the answer to the question of Shulamith, given of course by those who had asked her to return, and who take this mode of stating why they were in fact so much concerned to see Shulamith yet longer. They see in her "something that resembles the dance of Mahanaim," something as magnificent and transporting as the dance of the angel-host, east of the Jordan on

* [The abruptness with which this verse is introduced and the ambiguity of some of its expressions make its meaning extremely doubtful and have led to a variety of uncertain conjectures, but do not justify the acceptance of the incredible sense here put upon it. According to the view which is entertained of the context it has been supposed to be addressed to the bride, who was rising to leave the speakers (Taylor), or had been borne away from them by her inward rapture figuratively described in the preceding verse (Moody Stuart), or who had parted from them in company with her husband (Patrick), or who was timidly shrinking from meeting him (Williams, Good, the latter of whom renders thus: "Virgins.—'Return, return, O bride of Solomon! Return, return, that we may yet respect thee.' Royal Bride.—'What do you expect from the bride of Solomon?' Virgins.—'Fortitude, like the conflict of two armies'"). Or it is thought to be a call upon the bride to return from her alienation to her husband (Ainsworth, Burrowes, as well as Wordsworth, who thinks that the iteration of the appeal denotes a summons "to both Jew and Gentile to return to God and to one another in Christ and His Church"), or to return in peace from victorious conflict (Thrupp, who compares Josh. x. 21; Judg. viii. 9; xi. 31; 1 Kin. xxii. 28).—Tr.]

* [The article as well as the form of the noun certainly favor its derivation from the place of her birth or residence. The chief objections to it are, first that Shunem is never called Shulem in the Bible but always Shunem and its inhabitants Shunammites; and secondly, the bride is called a prince's daughter, vii. 2. The derivation from Solomon (to which Clarke compares Charlotte from Charles, Henrietta from Henry, etc.), is favored by most English commentators, and still divides the suffrages of the learned, though it does not satisfactorily account for the form of the name nor explain the presence of the article. Its derivation from Salem in the sense of Jerusalem, as though it were equivalent to Jerusalemite, as Gill and others suggest after Kimchi and Aben Ezra is utterly inadmissible. Others follow the example of Aquila (εἰρηνεύουσα) and attribute to it an appellative sense as derived from the root שָׁלֵם; so Patrick: "perfect," and Thrupp: "The peace-laden, lit., the bepeaced. The name is derived from the same root as Solomon and stands in partial correspondence with it."—Tr.]

Jacob's return home to the promised land. See Gen. xxxii. 1–3, to which passage there is an unmistakable allusion here as DÖPKE, DELITZSCH, HENGSTENB., MEIER, etc., correctly assume. This occurrence in the early patriarchal history as celebrated as Jacob's wrestling at Peniel (Gen. xxxii. 28, comp. Hos. xii. 4 ff.), this miraculous experience of the patriarch Jacob, to which the town of Mahanaim between Jabbok and the Jordan, the royal residence of the anti-Davidic northern kingdom under Ishbosheth (2 Sam. ii. 8 ff.) owed its name, forms here the point of comparison and is evidently intended to represent the sight of Shulamith as of angelic beauty and heavenly sublimity, just as she had before been compared with the morning dawn, the sun and moon (vi. 10), and in agreement with the fact that in other passages dances in praise of God are attributed both to the stars and to the angels of God (comp. Job xxxviii. 7; Judg. v. 20; Ps. ciii. 21; cxlviii. 2; 1 Kings xxii. 19; Luke ii. 13, etc.). The "dance of Mahanaim" is accordingly the well-known dance of the angels on the site where Mahanaim subsequently stood. It is not necessary to take הַמַּחֲנָיִם in its appellative sense "dance of the angel choirs" (DÖPKE) or "the angelic hosts" (GESEN.) or "the angel-camps" (DEL.) or "the double army" (UMBR., WEISSB.; comp. the TARG. in loc.). We must, however, decidedly reject every interpretation of these words, which sees in them an "invitation to dance," whether it is Solomon (so BÖTTCHER), or the ladies of the court (Ew., DELITZSCH, etc.), or Solomon and his companions (DÖPKE), who are supposed to make request of Shulamith to execute the famous dance of Mahanaim in their presence. Such a dance, whether it be regarded as a solemn festive dance, in which several took part (EWALD, BÖTTCHER, etc.), or as a contra-dance of two ranks, one consisting of young men, and the other of young women (HITZIG), or as a solo dance by a "danseuse of the Harem" (REN.), or as a "country festival dance in the simple attire of a shepherdess or a vine-dresser" (DEL.) is as devoid of evidence for its historical existence, as it is impossible to demonstrate from the present context that it was in this instance actually performed. And if actually exhibited on the stage, and described in the terms that follow (ver. 2 ff.), it certainly would not have afforded that "most chaste spectacle," that "indication of Shulamith's humility and childlike disposition" which DELITZSCH professes to see in it; comp. above No. 2, p. 94.

8. CONCLUSION. c. SOLOMON'S FINAL LAUDATION OF THE BEAUTY OF HIS BELOVED, vii. 2–6. DELITZSCH alone has put this description into the mouth of the daughters of Jerusalem instead of that of Solomon [so TAYLOR, GOOD, WILLIAMS, FRY, PATRICK, AINSWORTH and others on the ground chiefly that the king is spoken of in the third person, ver. 5], against which, however, may be urged not only the sameness of the tone, which prevails in this as in the following brief section (vers. 7–10), but also the circumstance that the caressing speeches here go further in one point at any rate, and to say the least, are more undisguised than could have been expected from the mouth of women (see ver. 3). This description of the beauty of Shulamith also has the greatest similarity to those which Solomon had previously given (iv. 1 ff.; vi. 4 ff.), only it enumerates her various charms in the reverse order, by ascending from the feet to the head, and thus proceeds in conformity with the customary Hebrew phrase "from the foot to the head" (2 Sam. xiv. 25; Isa. i. 6). That this inverted order of the description was not occasioned by the person described executing a dance, but simply arose from the poet's desire for variety, is correctly recognized even by HITZIG; comp. also EWALD in loc. (vs. DELITZSCH, VAIH., RENAN and others). One point of contact with a preceding passage of like character in the poem is found in the ten beautiful parts of the body, which are here adduced as in Shulamith's description of the charms of her lover (v. 10–16).—How beautiful are thy steps in the shoes, O prince's daughter! That the beginning is made with the steps (פְּעָמִים comp. Ps. lviii. 11; 2 Kings xix. 24), i. e., with the feet as stepping, as in motion, proves nothing in favor of the dancing hypothesis already rejected. For "to step" is not = "to dance," and Shulamith must have taken some steps at the beginning of this description, inasmuch as Solomon must have led her back to his or to her former position, or have conducted her to some seat after her purpose to go away. In doing so he points out to her her graceful and charming "steps in her shoes," or in other words how very becoming the shoes, which she wears as a "prince's daughter," are to her as she walks! The shoes are manifestly mentioned as something which she did not wear originally and in common (comp. v. 3), as a constituent, therefore, of her new and elegant court dress, which had doubtless been prepared in a most luxurious manner, both in material and style, and probably were ornamented with bows of purple, yellow or variegated ribbons, like the showy sandals of noble Hebrew women in later times (comp. Ezek. xvi. 10; Judith x. 9; WINER R.-W.-B., Art. "Schuhe"). She is at the same time designated a "prince's daughter" or "noble daughter" in order to indicate her present high rank (not her noble descent, which according to i. 6; ii. 8 ff., vi. 11 is improbable). בַּת is here used in a wide sense for female in general, to mark the fem. gender, as ii. 2; vi. 9; Gen. xxx. 13; Judg. xii. 9, etc.; and the term נָדִיב "noble" may have been suggested by the עַמִּי נָדִיב which she had used just before. That this form of address is substantially synonymous with "my sister bride" has already been observed on iv. 9 above. Thy rounded thighs are like jewels. Lit., "the roundings of thy thighs," i. e., the rounded parts which constitute thy thighs (יְרֵכַיִךְ genit. of the material [GREEN'S Heb. Gram., § 254, 4] as Ps. xl. 16: lxviii. 31, etc.—The word חֲלָאִים is very variously explained "necklace" or "jewels" (SEPT., VULG., SYR., ROSENM., MAGN., VAIH., BÖTTCHER), "clasps" (Ew.), "pearls" (HITZIG), "ornaments" (HENGSTENB.), or "ornamental chains." As is shown by the singular חֲלִי, חֶלְיָה, which occurs Prov. xxv. 12; Hos. ii. 15, some elegantly made ornament must be intended, and according to the passage before us it must be composed of round, smoothly turned globules or pearls, as it is used to set forth the perfectly rounded shape of the thighs.—The work of an artist's hands. The sing. מַעֲשֵׂה, which the SEPT. and SYR. correctly retain, is here employed because the numerous globules or pearls strung together, form but one whole, one necklace. The form אָמָּן, of the same signification with אָמוֹן Prov. viii. 30, and with the Chald. and Syr. אוּמָּן (see HITZIG in loc., and EWALD, Lehrbuch, § 152 b) serves to denote the artificer or artist (τεχνίτης, artifex) in contrast with the חָרָשׁ (τέκτων, faber) workman who only performs the coarser kind of work. That a skilful turner is here particularly intended appears from חֲלָאִים. The rotundity of the thighs is one of the noted beauties of the female figure, not merely according to Oriental, but also according to Grecian taste, as is shown by the well-known attribute of Aphrodite καλλίπυγος.

Ver. 3. Thy navel is a round bowl. שֹׁרֶר according to the unanimous testimony of the old translators = שֹׁר Ezek. xvi. 4, and = Arab. surr, i. e., "navel" (comp. on Prov. iii. 8). But, as we learn from the comparison with a round bowl or mixing vessel (on אַגָּן see just below), as well as from the following wish that this vessel may not lack mingled wine, the navel itself as such cannot be intended, but rather the whole belly (abdomen) with the navel as its centre. Correctly therefore HAHN, VAIH., WEISSBACH, etc., "dein Schooss," (thy lap) by which expression the reference demanded by what follows is sufficiently intimated, whilst the translation "pudenda" (MAGNUS, DÖPKE, HITZIG) cannot be justified on linguistic grounds; for both שְׁרִיר Job xl. 16, and the Arab. sirr (αἰδοῖον, arcanum) are only related, not identical ideas.—אַגָּן plur. אַגָּנוֹת (Isa. xxii. 24; Ex. xxiv. 6) does not denote a cup, but rather a bowl, a large round drinking vessel, here doubtless a bowl for mixing (κρατήρ, SEPT., VULG.) as the following מֶזֶג "mixed wine" shows. For that they prepared this drink (a mixture of wine with warm or cold water—Berachoth 7, 5; 8, 2: Pesach 7, 13; Maasser 4, 4) exclusively in smaller vessels as cups, goblets, etc., can scarcely be proved by the formula מָזוּג אֶת־הַכּוֹס (vs. HITZIG).—Let not mixed wine be lacking. This wish, which is not to be converted with the older interpreters into an objective statement, as "nunquam indigens poculis" VULG.) or "to which drink is never wanting" (LUTHER), contains without doubt an allusion of like nature, but not so delicate as that contained in v. 12 ff.* (comp. Prov. v. 15 ff.). Some modern commentators vainly seek by various methods to escape this admission, e. g., BÖTTCHER by the assumption that this wish was only designed to set forth in a vivid manner the circular form of the navel; HENGSTENB. by the allegorizing remark: "the capacity of the church to revive the thirsty with a noble refreshing draught is represented under the emblem of a bowl always full of mixed wine;" DEL. by the assertion: "The navel in so far as it became visible through her dress as she breathed harder in dancing (?) was like a circular cup which was not lacking in spiced wine" (but אַל with the following voluntative or jussive future!), "i. e., as full of blooming health (Prov. iii. 8) as that of spiced wine."—Thy body is a heap of wheat, set around with lilies.—עֲרֵמַת חִטִּים is certainly not a "sheaf of wheat" (EWALD, who here has in mind Ruth iii. 7, where, however, עֲרֵמָה rather means a heap of sheaves), but an accumulated heap of grain (comp. 2 Chron. xxxi. 6 ff.; Neh. iii. 34), so that the point of comparison lies on the one hand in its being arched over, and on the other in its yellowish-white color, and perhaps also subordinately in the fruitfulness of such a heap of grain. "Set around with lilies" appears to allude to the custom of "garnishing with flowers such a heap of wheat on the floor, when they threshed the grain in the open field immediately after the harvest" (DÖPKE),—a custom which, to be sure, has to be inferred solely from this passage. That the whole is a mere "fancy picture" (WEISSB., HITZIG) is improbable. Yet the comparison was probably suggested by the lily-red—we would have to say the rose-red—color of her dress which chastely and modestly covered, as it should, the body of the young lady, just as in v. 14 the sapphires enveloping the "ivory figure" indicated the color of the garment. At all events

* [There is no reason for suspecting an indelicacy in this perfectly harmless expression. Neither the words employed, the mode of their employment, nor the connection in which they stand warrant such an imputation. NOYES correctly says the "spiced wine" is "mentioned merely to set off the beauty and richness of the cup." MOODY STUART: "The dress of the bride is described throughout, except where clothing is not worn, as on the neck and the face. The proof of this is ample and irresistible in the very first line of the picture—the feet 'beautiful with shoes.' The person might have been clothed, while the feet were unshod; but it was impossible that the feet should be beautified with the finest sandals, without the whole person being arranged as a bride adorned for her husband. Both the terms, therefore, in this verse are of necessity parts of dress covering the corresponding parts of the person, according to the tendency in all languages to transfer the names that designate the living body to the dress that both conceals and adorns it. There is a great agreement of critics, as well as obvious suitableness in interpreting the goblet of wine as an image of the clasp that secures the girdle, composed probably of rubies to which wine is often compared." So substantially also PATRICK, HARMER, PARKHURST, TAYLOR, WILLIAMS, and others. GOOD, on the contrary, objects to the opinion "that the royal poet, instead of delineating the personal charms, 'the unbought graces' of his accomplished fair, is merely describing her different habiliments with the splendid figures which were wrought on them. Against such an interpretation I cannot but strongly protest, as equally unpoetical, and unjust to the text. In the literal sense of the original, I see no indelicacy whatever, and there ought to be no indelicacy in its translation. The royal bard is merely assuming a liberty, and that in the chastest manner possible, which we are daily conceding in our age to every painter and sculptor of eminence." GOOD coincides in opinion with ZÖCKLER, that "navel" is here used in a wide sense for "the whole of the surrounding region," and proposes the rendering "waist." Adopting this suggestion, BURROWES presents the following picture as his conception of the figure here described: "First, the feet more beautiful in the elegant sandals; then the contour, the folds of the bridal dress falling around the hips, graceful as the curvature of a rich necklace wrought by a finished hand; next, the body like a heap of wheat encompassed with lilies; then, the waist expanding into the bosom, elegant as a goblet rounded gracefully upwards, and filled with the richest spiced wine." SCOTT: "Comeliness of person, not richness of attire or ornament, is intended; otherwise the commendations would be equally appropriate to the most deformed, if splendidly attired, as to the most beautiful; nor is there any need to remove the garments in order to distinguish a very well proportioned and comely person from others in the most ordinary intercourse of life. Either men or women may disguise themselves by decoration; but becoming raiment sets off the form of those who wear it."] the characteristic feature, and the chief significance, perhaps, of the entire figure lies not in this subsidiary matter of setting it around with lilies, but in the heap of grain. Approximate parallels are adduced by DÖPKE, MAGN., etc., e. g., a passage from MOTANEBBI (v. HAMMER, p. 74), where the loins of a girl are likened to a sand-hill; OMMONRHEIF (Hamasa, in REISKE Taraf., p. 53), "Nates habet ut tumulos arenæ rore compactæ;" NUWEIRIUS (loc. cit., p. 131): "Poetæ comparant nates amatæ cum collibus arenaceis."

Ver. 4. Thy two breasts are like two young roes, etc.—Comp. iv. 5. "Feeding among the lilies" is omitted here, because the figure of lilies had just been employed with a somewhat different application; not from regard to ver. 9, which has nothing to do with "feeding" either in figure or in fact (vs. WEISSBACH).

Ver. 5. Thy neck is like a tower of ivory.—The tert. comp. lies on the one hand in its being slender and straight, and on the other in the pure white skin of the neck; it is therefore similar, though not exactly like that in iv. 4. The ivory tower here mentioned is certainly different from the tower of David named there, inasmuch as it is not to be conceived of as a tower for defence or an arsenal, but without doubt a structure designed for purposes of luxury, like Ahab's ivory house (1 Kings xxii. 39; comp. Am. iii. 15; Ps. xlv. 9), or like the ivory throne, on which Solomon sat, according to 1 Kings x. 18 ff.—Thine eyes pools in Heshbon.—As v. 12 the eyes of the lover are compared with "doves by brooks of water, bathing in milk, sitting on fullness," so here the eyes of his beloved are likened to light blue pools or basins of water, which charmingly mirror back the rays of the sun. Comp. OVID, de arte amat., II., 722:—"oculos tremulo fulgore micantes, ut sol a liquida sæpe refulget aqua." The pools near Heshbon, perhaps just two pools lying near together before one of the principal gates of this city, may have been especially suited for such a comparison by the clearness of their sheets of water and the loveliness of their banks. Modern travellers, as SEETZEN, BURCKHARDT, etc., still mention at least one large reservoir of water near Hesbân (the ancient Heshbon, the city of the Moabitish kings, Deut. ii. 24 ff.; Isa. xv. 4), lying in a wady south of the city, which is enthroned on a high hill, and consisting of excellent masonry; comp. CROME, Palästina, I., 254 ff.—At the gate of the daughter of multitudes.—This "daughter of multitudes" (בַּת רַבִּים lit. "daughter of many," λεωφόρος) or populous city is assuredly Heshbon itself (comp. the frequent designation of cities by the personifying expression בַּת "daughter," e. g., Isa. i. 8; x. 32; xxiii. 12; Ps. cxxxvii. 6), a city which in the age of David and Solomon was certainly next to Rabbath Ammon, the most populous place in the neighboring kingdoms, or rather provinces of Israel east of the Jordan. HENGSTENBERG's opinion is inadmissible that בַּת רַבִּים is only another expression for רַבָּה "Rabbah," or רַבַּת בְּנֵי עַמּוֹן "Rabbath of the children of Ammon," so that here the pools of two trans-jordanic cities would be named. And so is HITZIG's notion that "the populous" is the name of a particular gate* of the city of Heshbon (בַּת רַבִּים therefore not genitive but appositive), viz., that at which the markets and the tribunals were commonly held; for there is no example anywhere else of the personification of the gates of a city as daughters.—Thy nose like the tower of Lebanon, which looks toward Damascus.—Literally: as "a tower of Lebanon"†—but it does not follow from this absence of the definite article that one tower out of several of the same kind and situation is intended (HITZIG). For it is plainly designated as a watch-tower, or a look-out by צוֹפֶה וגו׳; and though there may have been in all several structures of this description on Mount Lebanon (for according to 2 Sam. viii. 6 David had set military garrisons in Damascene Syria), yet there could scarcely have been more than one that "looked toward Damascus," i. e., which served for the military observation of this city, which since Rezon's defection had become dangerous to Israel's northern frontier (comp. 1 Kings xi. 23, 24). Naturally enough it cannot now be accurately determined where this tower of Lebanon is to be looked for, whether at Fukra, in the neighborhood of which ROBINSON indicates a "remarkable tower" probably designed for military purposes (Zeitschr. d. Deutsch.-Morgenl. Gesellsch. VII. 1, 77), or at Magdol, a place in the same region, with a very ancient temple looking to the north (ibid., p. 72). At all events, however, this tower of Lebanon is totally distinct from the tower of David mentioned iv. 4, and this the more certainly as the latter served to represent a majestic and beautifully ornamented neck, and the former a straight nose, forming a handsome profile.

Ver. 6. Thy head upon thee like Carmel.—On the somewhat inaccurate expression "thy head upon thee," in which the head appears in some sort as an appendage to the entire man, comp. 2 Kings vi. 31; Judg. xiv. 18.—The main thing to be regarded in the comparison with Carmel is, that next to Lebanon it is the loftiest mountain in Northern Palestine, and for this reason perhaps it is often designated רֹאשׁ הַכַּרְמֶל "head of Carmel" (1 Kings xviii. 42; Am. ix. 3; comp. Jer. xlvi. 18); probably also there may be a subordinate reference to its being covered with dense woods, an emblem of a luxuriant growth of hair (Mic. vii. 14; comp. v. 13 a above)—whilst its loveliness, which HENGSTENBERG would have to be most of all regarded, is probably left out of the account.—And thy flowing locks like purple.—דַּלָּה here coma pendula—literally "the pendant, that which hangs down from thy head" (comp. Isa. xxxviii. 12, where it denotes the thrum, i. e., the threads of the old web hanging down on the loom, to which the new are attached) from דלל pendere, Job xxxviii. 4.—In the comparison of the hair with purple

* [So THRUPP: "That gate of Heshbon which opened northeastward in the direction of Rabbah of Ammon," or "the gate of approach to the pools, the portal through which the multitude of the Gentile world presses to drink to the full of the clear and unruffled waters of Christian doctrine."]

† [The correct translation is "the tower of Lebanon," the entire expression being rendered definite by the article before the last noun. See GREEN's Heb. Gram. § 246, 3.—TR.]

(אַרְגָּמָן particularly denoting the red purple in distinction from the dark violet-blue purple or תְּכֵלֶת) the color is not so much taken into consideration—for red hair, or such as at all inclines to a reddish cast, is not at all supposable in an Oriental beauty—as its dark lustre (comp. v. 11). As also with the Greeks πορφύρεος often has almost the same signification with μέλας, and hence, e. g., ANACREON (xxviii. 6, 7) uses πορφυραὶ χαῖται as the synonym of κόμαι μέλαιναι; PROPERTIUS, III., 17, 22, speaks of the purpurea coma of Nisus, and SUIDAS explains the Homeric κυανοχαίτης by "μελανόθριξ, πορφυρόθριξ" (other pertinent citations from TIBULL., VIRG., CIC., PLIN., etc., see in ROSENM. and DÖPKE in loc.). It is, moreover, also possible that some purple ornament, that Shulamith may have worn braided in her hair (comp. Iliad, xvii. 52), gave occasion to the comparison; whilst there is no need whatever of supposing an allusion to the later custom among the Hebrew women of dying their hair with henna and the like to give it a yellowish red appearance. Comp. DÖPKE in loc. and WINER R.-W.-B., Art. "Haar."—A king fettered by curls. The noble lustre of his beloved's head of hair just described makes the transition easy to the powerful effect which it, or more particularly her wonderfully beautiful locks, has wrought on him, her royal lover (comp. iv. 9). On the comparison of pretty locks with nets or snares, in which the lover is caught, Ecclus. ix. 3, 4, as well as numerous parallels from Oriental poets (in EWALD, HEILIGST., and DÖPKE); also Prov. vi. 25, where this ensnaring effect is attributed to the eye-lashes, as Eccles. vii. 26, to the arms of the beloved object. The VULG., SYR., LUTH., and more recently WEISSBACH and FRIEDRICH connect* מֶלֶךְ with אַרְגָּמָן: "as the king's purple," or as "purple of a king," but in so doing involve themselves in inextricable difficulties in the explanation of the concluding words: אָסוּר בָּרְהָטִים (e. g., FRIEDRICH: "as the purple of a king that is unbound like the folds in the troughs;" WEISSBACH: "as a king's purple fastened in running water"—where an allusion is supposed to the purple dye-houses on the Phœnician side of Carmel)!

9. THIRD SCENE, a. SOLOMON: vers. 7–11.

Ver. 7. How fair art thou, and how comely, O love, among delights.—It is no more necessary here than in iii. 10, to take אַהֲבָה in the sense of אֲהוּבָה, as is done by the VULG. ("charissima") and SYR., or to point it accordingly as HITZIG proposes. We evidently have to do with an apostrophe to love as such, like that contained in iv. 10, only for the more concrete idea "thy love," the more universal one of love in general is here substituted. אַהֲבָה has substantially the same sense as in ii. 7, v. 8, viii. 6, 7, or as in 2 Sam. i. 26, etc. In a strangely arbitrary manner WEISSBACH takes אַהֲבָה in its proper infinitive sense as in apposition with the predicate not as a vocative: "how fair art thou, and how comely, a loving in delight"—which is made to mean "one, to love whom awakens delight."—תַּעֲנוּגִים (or תַּעֲנוּגוֹת Eccles. ii. 8) are not "caresses" (HENGSTENB.), but the sensations of pleasure connected with them, "joys, delights" (comp. Prov. xix. 10, Mic. i. 16, ii. 9). Solomon does not mean by it vulgar, carnal pleasure, but the sweet joys of connubial intercourse, as he now experiences them anew in embracing Shulamith.—On the necessity of assuming either an exit of the chorus, or their withdrawal to the back-ground during the enthusiastic manifestations of conjugal tenderness which begin here, comp. above, No. 2, p.100, where all that was necessary is noted respecting the propriety of having a new scene begin with this verse.

Ver. 8. This thy stature resembles a palm tree. The זֹאת "this" before קוֹמָתֵךְ "thy stature" is commonly regarded as referring back to the description of the beauty of the beloved, contained in vers. 2–6, which however is the more inadmissible, as separate parts only of the body were there spoken of, for whose combination into one idea מַרְאֶה (v. 15), and not קוֹמָה, would have been the proper expression. DELITZSCH correctly remarks: "As he lets her go from his arms, he surveys her figure with his eyes, and finds it like the palm-tree," etc. To get a lively impression of her towering stature (comp. קוֹמָה in Isa. x. 33; Ezek. xxxi. 3; Ps. xxxvii. 24), he must have let go of her for a moment at least, and have contemplated her more from a distance. The female name Tamar, which is not an unusual one in the Old Test., is based upon the comparison, which is quite a favorite with oriental poets, of a tall and slender stature with the palm (comp. FRAEHN on Ibn Fossl., p. 72; also HOMER, Od. vii. 160). And thy breasts clusters, i. e. those of the palm-tree, by which must be intended the date-palm, loaded with its clusters of fruit (correctly ROSENMUELLER, BÖTTCHER, HITZIG), especially as it is not until the following verse that the transition is made to clusters of grapes, which are expressly designated as such by the addition of הַגֶּפֶן "the vine." That the date clusters are rather hard, and to that extent appear not to correspond to the swelling softness of the breasts, does not impair the suitableness of the comparison, as the only thing regarded is the form (vs. WEISSB.) Moreover, the mention of breasts again in this passage (comp. ver. 4) proves that the preceding description (vers. 2–6) is not closely connected with that before us, and consequently that WEISSBACH's opinion that twelve beauties are designedly enumerated in vers. 2–11 (viz., the stature and the breasts, in addition to the preceding ten), lacks confirmation.

Ver. 9. I resolve I will climb the palm-tree, אָמַרְתִּי is not to be taken as a preterite "I said," or "I resolved," at some former time, etc., as though these words referred back to v. 1 (so

*[So too HOUBIGANT and THRUPP; the latter of whom renders: "like royal purple enfixed among the wainscotings. The picture is that of a rich chamber, on the walls of which are carved wooden panels alternate with purple hangings. The former serve to relieve and to show off the beauty of the latter, to which latter the well-ordered and well-fastened tresses of the bride's hair are compared."] VULG., LUTHER, etc.), but as a present, since several other wishes are uttered in what follows, but no mention is made of any previous fulfilment of these wishes. Comp. also תְּשׁוּקָתוֹ ver. 11, which plainly points to a fond desire of her lover, just manifested afresh, not to one entertained at a former period. I will grasp its boughs. סַנְסִנִּים lit. "that which is on top" (kindred with סלל, תלל to lift up), i. e., the branches and leaves forming the crown of the palm-tree. A more particular interpretation of the figure, e. g., so that the nose and mouth, which her lover wished to kiss, are here intended by the "branches" (WEISSB.), is inadmissible, and leads to offences against good taste.—And be thy breasts, please, like clusters of the vine (comp. on ver. 8), and the breath of thy nose like apples. Nothing more is here expressed than the design to kiss, or to revel in the beauty and the sweetness of the face and the bosom of his beloved. Chap. iv. 16, v. 1, is, therefore, not to be directly compared.—"The breath of the nose" (comp. Isa. ii. 22, 2 Sam. xxii. 16) is here expressly mentioned, because this is what is perceived in kissing the mouth. The figure of apples is the more appropriate, because the apple תַּפּוּחַ derives its name in Hebrew from its delightful fragrance.

Ver. 10. And thy palate like the best wine. The palate is not named here as the organ of speech (HENGSTENB. and others), but as a substitute for the mouth or the lips in respect to the sweet breath or lovely kisses (comp. v. 13). יֵין הַטּוֹב lit. "wine of the good" (comp. בִּרְכַּת־טוֹב Prov. xxiv. 25), is equivalent to "delightful, excellent wine." See on this periphrasis for the adjective, EWALD, Lehrb. § 287, b [GREEN'S Heb. Gram., § 254, 6, b].—Going down for my beloved smoothly. As the supposition that לְדוֹדִי "for my beloved" has slipped in here by mistake from the 11th verse following (AMM., HEILIGST., HITZ.: also EWALD formerly), is as arbitrary as its change to לְדֹדַי "my love" (VELTH., MEIER), or to לְדוֹדִים "beloved ones, friends" (so EWALD now), there is no doubt that Shulamith here takes up the king's words, in order as in iv. 16 to continue his description, and to give him to understand, in the most flattering way, that she fully responds to his love, and is ready to grant him every enjoyment of it.—Gliding over the lips of sleepers. Others: causing the lips of those that are asleep to speak (MERCERUS, HENGSTENB., DEL., etc., connecting דּוֹבֵב with דִּבָּה speaking (in a bad sense), slander); or "causing the lips of sleepers to long for it" (WEISSB.), etc. But for דבב—whence דֹּב as the name of the bear with his slow and awkward gait—the signification "to flow gently," or "to glide," is suitable enough, and the meaning undoubtedly is, that pleasant tasting wine easily puts one to sleep, so that he who drinks it is insensibly overtaken by slumber (correctly Ew.). There is certainly no allusion to the saliva oris of two lovers united in a kiss, (according to the expression in LUCRETIUS, "junguntque salivas oris," etc.) for such an image of refined sensuality is inconceivable in the mouth of the chaste Shulamith.

Ver. 11. I am my beloved's (comp. vi. 3), and for me is his desire.—Lit.: "and on me (rests) his desire." תְּשׁוּקָה as in Gen. iii. 16, the passage which lies at the basis of this, of the longing desire of the man for the society of his wife, not of gross sensual desires for sexual intercourse. The whole is a triumphant exclamation in which Shulamith joyfully affirms that her lover cannot exist without her, and it thus prepares the way for her making the request of him, which follows. With indescribable vulgarity HITZIG asserts that "the concubine here recognizes with faltering voice and bursting eyes the mutual necessity of love."

10. CONTINUATION AND CONCLUSION. b. Shulamith's victorious assault on Solomon's heart, vii. 12—viii. 4.

Ver. 12. Come, my beloved, let us go out to the country.—The beloved (דּוֹד) who is addressed, can be no other than the one addressed just before in vers. 10, 11, that is to say, Solomon, not the "shepherd," to whom she certainly would not have been obliged in the first instance to have expressed her wish to escape from the contracted city walls into the country in the form of an earnest entreaty, and a fluent and impassioned persuasion, even if he were with her in Jerusalem (vs. BÖTTCH., HITZ., REN.); and if he was not with her, it was utterly useless to address these words to him when far remote (vs. Ew., VAIH.). Her persuasion is plainly directed to a lover, who was really present, and besides was seriously meant, not a mere fantastical make-believe request, a desire which the petitioner was convinced beforehand could not possibly be granted (vs. WEISSB.).—Let us lodge in the villages.—To the country (שָׂדֶה) are here added villages (כְּפָרִים from כֹּפֶר 1 Sam. vi. 18; construct כְּפַר) as in 1 Chron. xxvii. 25. They are alone adapted to the idea of "lodging, passing the night" (לִין), not "cypress-flowers" or "alhennas," which DÖPKE., Ew., MEIER unsuitably mingle in here, and which could scarcely have been so common then in the holy land, that people could sleep on them or under them (comp. on i. 14).—On the necessity of spending at least two nights on the way from Jerusalem to Shunem, see on iii. 8 above (p. 82).

Ver. 13. Let us start early for the vineyards.—It is not vineyards lying on the route to Shunem, which they might visit on their way, that are here intended, but doubtless the vineyards at Shulamith's home, and probably her own. For it was in these alone that she could take so lively an interest as is expressed in what follows.—We shall see whether the vine has sprouted, its blossoms opened.—The vines and pomegranates here named are the same as those in vi. 11. Shulamith wishes to return with her lover to just those innocent rural occupations and pleasures, which are there described as belonging to her former mode of life. The season implied, as in vi. 11 and in ii. 11 ff., is the spring—that period in the year which most incites and allures to the enjoyment of external nature. It is inadmissible to suppose that precisely one year had elapsed between the spring depicted in those passages and that which is here implied (HITZ.). It is more probable—inasmuch as the whole action appears to run its course in two or three weeks (comp. on ii. 8 ff. above, p. 69)—that the same spring is meant here as there, supposing the poet to have formed a clear conception of the intervals between the main particulars of the action.—There will I give thee my love.—דֹּדַי means not "thy caresses bestowed on me," but "mine bestowed on thee." This to be sure, she has already granted him (see iv. 16; vii. 7 ff.), but not as yet continuously, nor without temporary disturbances and interruptions (comp. vi. 4 f.; vi. 11), nor as yet with the full and unreserved opening of her heart. But there (שָׁם with strong emphasis, as Am. vii. 12) there amid the loveliness and joyous freedom of fair nature she will become entirely his.—Observe how little this passage again suits the so-called shepherd hypothesis; or even WEISSBACH's supposition that Shulamith is not serious in uttering the wish before us, and that שָׁם אֶתֵּן is therefore to be taken conditionally: "There would I give—if it were only supposable that you could go with me" (?!).

Ver. 14. The mandrakes give forth their odor.—הַדּוּדָאִים are not "lilies" (LUTHER), but the fruit of the mandrake (mandragora vernalis, or atropa mandragora), a wild plant common in Palestine, particularly in Galilee (SCHUBERT, Reise, III., 117), of the same genus with the belladonna, with small whitish-green blossoms, which in May or June become small yellow apples, about the size of a nutmeg, of a strong and agreeable odor (μῆλα εὔοσμα, Test. Issachar, c. 1; comp. Dioscorid. IV. 76: εὐώδη μετὰ βάρους τινός). As now these apples have a pleasant smell, but not the blossoms nor the plant itself, Shulamith of course refers to the former, and here therefore looks forward to a more advanced season than in ver. 13—that is to say, the time of wheat harvest (see Gen. xxx. 14), as in what follows in her mention of "this year's fruit" her imagination goes still further forward.—These apples, according to Gen. xxx. 14–16, were regarded as an artificial provocative of sexual love (whence also the name דּוּדָאִים from דּוֹר, דּוֹדִים) even in the earliest Oriental antiquity; so also by the Greeks and Romans, by whom they were therefore called κιρκαία, Circeta (comp. also the name Ἀφροδίτη μανδραγορῖτις in HESYCHIUS and PHAVORINUS), by the Arabs, who to this day call them tuffâh es-Shaitân, "Satan's apples," by all Christendom in the middle ages (see GRAESSE, Beiträge zur Literatur und Sage des Mittelalters, 1850), and by many still in modern times; comp., e. g., Father MYLLER in his Journey to the Promised Land: "This root (!), which I found in the wilderness of St. John the Baptist, and brought considerable of it away with me, has many medicinal virtues, removes barrenness, and makes efficacious love-potions." (See DEL., Genesis, p. 467.) Shulamith certainly does not name the dudaim here on account of these supposed aphrodisiac qualities, much less does she mean to intimate an intention to prepare a magic potion from them to excite her lover to a higher degree of affection. This fruit is rather to her in her innocence and simplicity merely the symbol of love, and her naming them here like the "excellent fruits of all sorts over our doors" is merely designed to add to the attractions and enjoyments of her home, which she had before mentioned, such as were new and less familiar to her lover (see WEISSB. in loc.). MEIER goes too far in seeking a symbolic sense for the words, when he understands "the love apples are fragrant" to mean simply "I am deeply in love," and "the old fruit and the new" there mentioned to signify the sweet fruits of love, of which she would give him to partake, the old love which had been in existence hitherto, and the new, which would meanwhile grow up and reach a heightened intensity. See in opposition to this allegorizing, which fritters away the simple freshness of a description so true to nature for the sake of insipid trivialities, HITZ. and WEISSB. in loc.—And over our doors are all sorts of excellent fruit, new as well as old.—By "our doors" Shulamith means the doors of her parental home in Shunem, where, besides her brothers and sister (i. 6; viii. 8), her mother still lived (comp. iii. 4; viii. 2). This house had probably several doors, at all events a front and a back door, and likely also side doors, whence the plural. On shelves in the inside over these doors they may have kept choice ripe fruit, as is often done in our farmers' houses; hence the עַל "over" before פְּתָחֵינוּ "our doors," which can neither mean "in front of" (LUTHER, v. AMM.), nor "within" (MAGN.) nor "by" or "at" (COCC., HAHN, GOLTZ, etc.). Prov. xvii. 19 also seems to allude to a use of the beams or boards over the doors of rustic dwellings for keeping various objects (even if not exactly for the construction of regular store-rooms).—On מְגָדִים lit., "excellencies, precious things" comp. iv. 13. כָּל־ refers to the various kinds of this fine fruit, not as WEISSB. affirms, to the distinction between this year's and last year's fruit. As regards these two expressions (חֲדָשִׁים גַּם יְשָׁנִים), they are both to be taken in the same sense as Mat. xiii. 52 καινὰ καὶ παλαιά (comp. also Lev. xxv. 22; xxvi. 10), and as epithets limiting כָּל־מְגָדִים; they must not in violation of the accents be connected with the final clause "I have, my beloved, laid up for thee" (vs. MAGN., DEL., MEIER). This as well as the reference of the verb צָפַנְתִּי to the whole sentence from עַל־פְּתָחֵינוּ onward, as if the last three clauses of the verse formed one long period (EW., UMBR., WEISSB.) is inadmissible, for though she might speak of having stored old or last year's fruit for her lover, the same could not be said of this year's, which had still to ripen and grow.

VIII. 1. O that thou wert as a brother of mine, כְּאָח cannot possibly be taken as a simple vocative (SEPTUAG., LUTH.). It rather refers to a relation like that of a brother ("as a brother of mine," comp. Ps. xxxv. 14) and consequently expresses the wish and that a wish seriously meant and speedily to be realised (vs. WEISSB.), that Solomon would come so near to her in every respect, both inwardly and outwardly, that she could regard and treat him just as her own brother, as a member of her family, belonging to her own domestic household. The wish here expressed would have no meaning in respect to a lover of the rank of a shepherd. It most manifestly implies as its object a lover, whose whole station in life was above that of his beloved, in whose case there must be a coming down from his elevation, if an actual living communion is to subsist between him and her. For the fact of his having made his beloved a "queen" and a "prince's daughter" is evidently without effect on the child-like and humble mind of this simple child of nature. She has not been able to prevail upon herself in addressing this proud lord of a harem, surrounded by his sixty queens and his eighty concubines, as well as by his female slaves, to call him her own with the same cordial confidence that a sister cherishes towards her brother. She has learned to call him דּוֹד "beloved" but not אָח "brother," often as he may since their marriage have addressed her as אֲחֹתִי כַלָּה "my sister, bride." If this relation which she sustained to him be correctly estimated, HENGSTENBERG's paraphrase of the exclamation before us "O that thou who art my brother, wouldst enter into a really brotherly relation to me" will appear to be by no means so absurd, as WEISSB. would represent it.* Were I to find thee without, I would kiss thee. "Without," i. e. on the street or in the open country and in general wherever I must now observe a stiff courtly etiquette toward thee as king. A new protest therefore against the manners of the harem, which had become intolerable to her.—Yet none would despise me. לֹא־יָבֻזוּ לִי they, viz. the people, would not despise and reproach me as though I were a vulgar wench who kissed strange men in the public street; comp. Prov. vii. 12, 18.

Ver. 2. I would lead thee, bring thee to my mother's house. What she had only dreamed before iii. 4, she can now utter to her lover as the burning wish of her heart, certain of its speedy accomplishment. אֶנְהָגְךָ "I would lead thee," that is to say by the hand; whither is told by the following verb, which limits the one before it in the same way as אַשְׁקְךָ does אֶמְצָאֲךָ in ver. 1, b.—Thou wouldst instruct me. Again an indication that the lover is not a young shepherd but the wise and learned king Solomon, in comparison with whom Shulamith had long learned to feel her ignorance and at the same time her need of instruction from the rich stores of his mind. Feeling the incongruity of instruction by a lover, who was a mere shepherd, HITZ. has taken up again the conjecture of IBN EZRA, that שֶׁ is to be supplied before תְּלַמְּדֵנִי and the verb thus converted into a relative clause is to be referred as a 3d pers. fem. to the preceding אִמִּי: "my mother who would teach me," viz. how to do every thing for you in the best manner. But this is quite arbitrary; for all the verbs before and after are in the 2d pers. [?]; a verb thus extraordinarily interrupting this series must necessarily have been indicated not merely by שֶׁ or אֲשֶׁר but by an emphatic הִיא "she"; and to this הִיא would then have to be opposed an אֲנִי אַשְׁקְךָ etc. comp. (BÖTTCHER Neue Aehrenl. III. 172). Most of the ancient versions confirm ours, which is the common view; and that the SEPT. and SYR. in place of תְּלַמְּדֵנִי have mechanically repeated the last line of iii. 4, can prove nothing against its correctness. I would give thee to drink of the spiced wine. That אַשְׁקְךָ "I would cause thee to drink" contains an intentional allusion to אֶשָּׁקְךָ "I would kiss thee," ver. 1, which is identical in its consonants, is an idle remark of HITZIG and WEISSBACH, which has little in its favor. MEIER has needlessly taken this clause to be a statement of what her lover was to teach the speaker, "thou wouldst teach me how to make thee drink," etc.; so too EWALD and HEILIGST., according to whom the meaning is: "from thy mouth I would learn, what is pleasant and agreeable to thee. viz., to cause thee to drink," etc. But all is simpler and in better taste if we assume no close relation between תְּלַמְּדֵנִי "thou wouldst instruct me" and this clause, and find nothing intimated here beyond the reciprocity subsisting between the spiritual gifts which the teacher confers, and the bodily refreshment which his pupil affords him in turn (comp. Luke x. 38 ff., 1 Cor. ix. 11; Gal. vi. 6).—By the spiced wine, of which she means to give him to drink, Shulamith probably means grape wine mixed with fragrant and pungent essences (according to a well-known oriental custom, comp. DÖPKE and VAIH., in loc.). The definite article designates this wine as the well known drink of superior excellence, as the spiced wine par excellence; comp. יֵין הַטּוֹב vii. 10. Of my pomegranate juice. Notwithstanding the absence of the copula something different from the preceding is here intended and not the spiced wine itself, as though this were merely made from the juice of fruit (HITZIG). For such a difference is indicated by the use of עָסִיס "must, unfermented juice," instead of the preceding יַיִן "wine," as well as by the mention above of the vine along with the pomegranate (vii. 13, comp. vi. 11). The suffix in רִמֹּנִי (for which the VULG. and SYR. read רִמּוֹנַי "my pomegranates") is gen. of possession to עָסִיס (comp. הַר קָדְשִׁי) hence equivalent to "pomegranate wine prepared by me." It makes against the view of WEISSBACH and others: "of the wine of my pomegranate tree," that according to vi. 11; vii. 13, Shulamith had more than one such tree.—The ancients called the fermented juice of pomegranates "wine," as appears from PLIN. H. N. 14, 16: "Vinum fit—e punicis, quod rhoiden (ῥοιά, pomegranate) vocant"; comp. WINER R.-W.-B. Art. "Wein."

Ver. 3. His left hand (is) under my head and his right embraces me. This verse is not a mere phrase to mark the termination of a section, and unconnected with what precedes (HITZIG). It rather stands in the same sort of connection with the detailed description given vii. 18 ff. of what the two lovers would do and enjoy together in Shulamith's home, that ii. 6 does with the preceding representation of their mutual enjoyment of nature and of love, i. 16 ff.; ii. 3 ff. Only there Shulamith was depicting the present, whilst here she vividly portrays joys belonging to the future; though not in an optative form, as EWALD, VAIH., etc., assume without sufficient reason.

Ver. 4. I adjure you, ye daughters of Jerusalem, etc.—On the significance of this exclamation here as Shulamith's farewell to the daughters of Jerusalem (which HITZIG too has seen with substantial correctness), see on ii. 7 above. Only it is not necessary with VAIH. to impute the brevity of its form to the excited and reproachful tone in which Shulamith, who had been affronted by the ladies of the court, here speaks.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The churchly allegorical exegesis is necessarily precluded from gaining an insight into the progress of the action in the act before us. It finds every where figurative representations of soteriological mysteries with no inner organic connection; shifting figures, the aim of which lies in the repeated exhibition of the central point of Christian truth, the conversion, justification, sanctification and perfection of the sinner by the grace of the Redeemer, or the call and election of the whole church to the saving communion of God in Christ. Thus the narrative of the dream, v. 2–7, together with the following dialogue, as far as vi. 3, that is to say, the first scene according to our division seems to it to be a dramatic representation, which is already complete, of the apostasy and restoration of the Church, or of the fall and redemption of mankind. This one section constitutes, as it were, the Canticles in brief, a poetic picture of the entire history of redemption from first to last. This representation opens, according to HENGSTENB. (p. 135), with a "dark scene," or night piece. The apostasy of unbelieving mankind from their God, and especially the rejection of the Saviour by the daughter of Zion, together with the punishment of induration and blindness which overtook her in consequence, are so distinctly set forth by the dream-like figures of Shulamith's sleep, her lover's vain desire to be admitted, his subsequent disappearance, and the fruitless search for him, and finally by the blows which the watchmen (the "heavenly ministers of vengeance") administered to her during her search, that the whole forms, so to speak, a fit accompaniment to Isa. liii. and likewise an illustration of Rom. xi. 7, "the election hath obtained it and the rest were blinded," or of Rom. xi. 25, 26. And then again the representation is directed to the goal of the ultimate conversion of Israel and the consequent consummation of the entire redemptive process. For forsaken and repelled by her lover, she nevertheless continues always sick with love and longing for him (v. 8); in answer to the question proposed to test her, what she thinks of her lover (v. 9), she exhibits a heart full of love and submission to the heavenly Solomon, as the ideal of all excellence (v. 10–16); finally she answers the second question also, which is addressed to her to pave the way for her reunion with her heavenly bridegroom, in a concrete manner (vi. 1–3), since in her answer to, Where has thy beloved gone? she ungrudgingly recognizes that he has his being in the Church, and in consequence of this recognition the former relation may be regarded as restored.—So HENGSTENBERG, whose view may be regarded as the idealizing recapitulation of all former churchly-allegorical interpretations of this section.—The following portions also depict according to him the one main object of the song again and again—the restoration of the loving relation between the Lord and His Church, which originally existed, was then disturbed and broken off, and has finally been cemented again. Ch. vi. 4–10 does this in the form of praises of the beauty of the bride, and a comparison of her with all other women, who constitute the household of the heavenly Solomon. Ch. vi. 11—vii. 1 in the form of a narrative by the daughter of Zion of the way in which she attained to the high dignity of a bride of heaven's king, together with a blessing bestowed upon her by the daughters of Jerusalem, who express their heartfelt joy at her return from her wanderings, and at the distinguished graces which have in consequence been imparted to her; ch. vii. 2–11, in the form of a new panegyric pronounced by the king upon the daughter of Zion, who has returned to him from her straying, and consequently to her former beauty,—to which is further added the expression of his determination to enjoy her charms, and her cordial assent to this determination (vii. 8–11); and finally, vii. 12 to viii. 4, in the form of a prayer from the daughter of Zion to her heavenly lover, to restore to her his ancient love, and, far from the tumult of this sinful world, in rural retirement and seclusion, to live with her as her brother.—The explanations of the older allegorists are still richer in repetitions and in corresponding measure poorer in true inward progress. One of their number, e. g., STARKE (who closely follows MARCK, AINSWORTH, MICHAEL., etc.) paraphrases vi. 2, 3, so as to make the bride set forth "the delightful feelings resulting from the special presence of the bridegroom of her soul, which she has just experienced in her heart," describing thus Christ's control in the spice garden of His Church, i. e., in the hearts of the true children of God, wherein the whole work of salvation by the Lord in the word and sacraments, and His operations on individual souls, planting, fostering, preserving and perfecting, is briefly exhibited. Ch. vii. 1 he then paraphrases thus: "Return, return to me and to thyself from the confusion, in which thou wert, before I revealed myself again to thee (v. 6; Ps. cxvi. 7), O Shulamith, who hast obtained peace with God, righteousness and strength in communion with me; return again, banish all gloomy and timorous thoughts. I shall ever remain thy Jesus, thy Saviour and Benefactor. Fix only a confiding heart again on me, thy soul's friend, that we, viz. I, thy Redeemer, with my Father who loves thee in me, and the Holy Spirit may look upon thee, i. e., may have our delight and joy in thee as a perfect mirror of spiritual beauty." And in viii. 1 the same interpreter remarks upon the words, "Should I find thee without, I would kiss thee," etc.: If I find thee without, i. e., meet thee outside of my mother's house, while I live in the foreign land and the pilgrimage of this world (2 Cor. v. 6–9), I will kiss thee with the kiss of faith, love and obedience, yea, give thee all conceivable tokens of my sincere and ardent love (Ps. ii. 12; Hos. xiii. 2; Job xxxi. 27). And no one should put me to shame, least of all they, to whom I appear so despicable, and who scoff at me when I boast of my communion with thee and declare thy praise (v. 7; Gen. xxxviii. 23, etc., etc.)." In short, every possible thing is here found in every thing, and the simple meaning of the words is almost every where sacrificed to the superabundant fancy of a dogmatical and mystical interpretation.

2. The proper antithesis to such excesses can surely not lie in banishing with the profane-erotic exegesis every thing sacred from the course of the action here presented, and converting it, as is done particularly by HITZIG and RENAN, into a succession of voluptuous scenes in the harem, without order or progress. This view becomes really repulsive, especially where it maintains that the poet brings Solomon's love for other favorites than Shulamith before his readers or spectators by a detailed description of his amorous intercourse with them; that he describes with particularity by word and act how the king turns wearied away from the coy Shulamith, to "indemnify" himself with the other beauties of his harem. HITZIG's exegesis on the passage vii. 2–11 based on this understanding of it, even BÖTTCHER indignantly pronounces one that "culminates in the disgustingly vulgar,"—a judgment that might with equal reason be passed upon RENAN's treatment of the same section. But even in its more moderate form, as advanced by HERDER, UMBR., EW., VAIH., etc., the shepherd hypothesis invariably involves much that is of doubtful morality, by which the religious and ethical character of the section before us is sensibly damaged in several points. Solomon's character especially suffers more than is just, inasmuch as there is heaped upon him besides the reproach of polygamy with its excesses, that of an assiduous attempt at seduction and a corrupting assault upon female innocence, an actually adulterous procedure therefore,—which especially in the so-called "final assault," vii. 2–10, comes into unseemly contrast with the alleged fidelity of the maiden to a distant lover. Shulamith's character, too, appears on this view less fair and great than in ours; the extravagance, not to say the braggart character of the description given of her lover, v. 10–16, if this refers to a plain young shepherd, is particularly offensive; so is the excited pathos of the appeal which, according to this view, is directed to a far distant lover to go with her into the country, vii. 12 ff. Some of the finest and loveliest traits in the picture of this noble woman are wholly lost, especially the symbolic significance of her dream, v. 2–7; the lovely gentleness with which she seeks by her evasive answer in vi. 2, 3, to excuse her absent husband; the adroitness with which she interrupts him (vii. 10) in order wholly to disarm and captivate him; the genuine womanly naiveté with which, in her picture of the innocent joys of their life together in the country, she inserts, viii. 2, a hint of the instruction which she hopes to receive from her lover, etc.

3. The typical Messianic view avoids these faults in a manner which really satisfies both the æsthetic and the religious feeling. It throughout gives due prominence alike to light and shade, and while it sets forth in all its rigor the conflict of the lovely, chaste and pure child of nature with the corrupt manners of the court and her royal lover who shared them, it nevertheless paves the way likewise for a truly blessed reconciliation and removal of this conflict by showing how Shulamith's urgency to return to her country home, lays the foundation for a change of mind in her husband, and for satisfying her boldest and highest wishes. The true power of love in the humble maiden thus shines in its most glorious light, and the lover who at first resisted is drawn along by it; his resistance to the sanctity of the marriage connection is overcome by the purity of her feelings.—When put in a parallel with the relation of Christ to His Church, this episode from the story of the love of Solomon and Shulamith certainly exhibits more disparity than resemblance. But it forms also just that section of the story, in which the dissimilarity of the two relations must naturally come most strongly out, in some parts of it almost to the obliteration of every trace of similitude. And yet there remain even here significant analogies enough to establish the essentially Messianic character of the whole. Above all the glowing description of the beauty of the lover, v. 10–16, which is only applicable to Solomon, not to any of his subjects, points to the King of all kings as the heavenly prototype of that king, as the possessor of an eternal glory which far outshines the splendor of the earthly Solomon. Mankind seeking after God, and craving His salvation, the antitype in the history of redemption of the earthly Shulamith, by its earnest and continued longing, waiting, entreating and imploring, succeeds in moving this heavenly Solomon to give up his glory and enter into its low estate, as she moves her lord and king to the resolve to live with her in her mother's house, and to partake with her of all the simple country enjoyments and pleasures which this house, with its surroundings, could offer him and her. In this parallel there certainly lies a prophecy of the fulfilling of that which is written, John xiv. 23, "If a man love me, he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him;" likewise of 2 Cor. vi. 16 (Lev. xxvi. 11; Hebr. viii. 10), "I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people;" as well as of Rev. xxi. 3, "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and He himself, God with them, shall be their God." That significant phrase too, "thou wouldst instruct me," viii. 2, points to the higher stage of divine revelation to which mankind has been exalted under the New Testament, in the same manner as Isa. liv. 13 (John vi. 45): "And all thy children shall be taught of the LORD;" or as Jer. xxxi. 33 (Heb. viii. 10 ff.): "I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts;—and they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, saying, Know the LORD; for they shall all know me from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the LORD," (comp. Joel iii. 1 f.; Acts ii. 16 f.; 1 John ii. 27, etc.).—But certainly,—and herein lies the exaltation of the New Testament Solomon above the Old, and the superiority of the New Testament covenant of grace, as compared with the marriage covenant between Solomon and Shulamith—no express entreaty with flattering words and persistent supplication was needed to bring down the Lord of the New Covenant to His own. Even if here and there in His parables He assumes the air of the reluctant friend or the unmerciful judge, and thus seems to impose upon His own people the duty of importunate begging and crying (Luke xi. 5–8; xviii. 1–7), this is purposely done that the contrast between human hard-heartedness and His own infinitely merciful and prevenient love, may induce to a heartier confidence in the latter. His becoming poor in order to make us rich, His emptying and humbling Himself to the form of a servant was prevenient throughout, with no merit or worthiness on the part of man; yea, so that He "was found of them that sought Him not, and was made manifest unto them that asked not after Him" (Rom. x. 20; Isa. lxv. 1). Of His coming to His own it may in truth be said:

"You do not need to labor,
Nor struggle day and night,
To bring Him down from heaven,
By efforts of your might.
He comes of His own motion,
Is full of love and grace,
Your every grief and sorrow
He'll utterly efface."

And besides it is a real and substantial glory, which He gives up and forsakes from love to the poor children of men, not a mere seeming glory, full of sin and vanity, like that of the earthly Solomon. His love to the poor damsel of earth is so utterly unselfish that He gives everything and receives nothing, whilst she can give nothing but only receive (comp. ST. FRANCIS of Assisi's fable of the rich king Christ, and the fair damsel "Poverty"). Nay, she does not even possess as her own those "excellent fruits, new and old," with which she was to regale her gracious and heavenly guest upon his entrance into her mother's house. But it is her lover, and He alone, who makes the seed of His divine word bring forth in her good and worthy fruit, which endureth unto everlasting life. It is He alone who makes her rich in all the fruits of the Spirit and of righteousness (Phil. i. 11; Gal. v. 22, etc.). He alone distributes the precious wine of joy at the table of His grace, by which He solemnly seals and confirms with His earthly bride, the covenant of His love, established by His bloody sacrificial death (comp. John ii. 1–11). And while Shulamith's entreaty of her royal lord and husband "O that thou wert like my brother, who sucked the breasts of my mother" (viii. 1) can only be made in the most restricted sense,—while she, upon a calm and sober view of the case at least, can expect no more than a transient coming down of her lover into her poverty and retirement, the heavenly bridegroom of the Church, on the contrary, comes not only once and in the fullest truth, but for ever as our brother on the earth. He "is not ashamed to call all them, whom He redeems, His brethren" (Heb. ii. 11; comp. John xx. 17). He is made partaker of their earthly flesh and blood in order to raise them from being slaves of sin and death to be children of God and heirs of His eternal, heavenly blessedness (Heb. ii. 14, 15; John viii. 32–36).—Thus set in the light of His deeds of redeeming love, this section of the Canticles becomes a song of praise to the grace of the Lord, which worketh all in all, a hymn of glory to that inscrutable mystery of the Divine mercy, of which Paul exclaims, Rom. xi. 34 f.: "For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been His counsellor? Or who hath first given to Him and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of Him, and through Him, and to Him, are all things; to whom be glory for ever. Amen."

FIFTH SONG.

The return home and the triumph of the chaste love of the wife over the unchaste feelings of her royal husband.

CHAP. VIII. 5—14.

FIRST SCENE:

THE ARRIVAL HOME.

(Vers. 5–7.)

COUNTRY PEOPLE (in the fields at Shunem).

5 Who[1] is this coming up out of the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved?

SOLOMON (entering arm in arm with Shulamith).

Under[2] this[3] apple tree I waked thee;[4]
there[5] thy[6] mother travailed[7] with thee, there travailed she that bare thee.

SHULAMITH (familiarly pressing up close to her lover).

6 Place[8] me as a signet-ring upon thy heart, as a signet-ring upon thine arm.
For strong as death is love, hard as Sheol[9] is jealousy Its flames[10] are flames of fire, a blaze of Jehovah.[11]

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 [WICL.: The voice of the synagogue, of the church. MAT.: The synagogue speaking of the church.]

2 [WICL.: The voice of Christ to the synagogue, of the holy cross. Under an apple tree I reared thee. MAT.: The voice of the spouse before the spousess. COV., MAT.: I am the same that waked thee up among the apple trees. BISH.: I waked thee up among, etc. GENEV.: I raised thee up under an [ENG. VER.: the] apple tree.]

3 הַתַּפּוּחַ deictic: "this apple tree."

4 We read עוֹרַרְתִּיךְ.

5 שָׁמָּה we take to be synonymous with שָׁם as in Jer. xviii. 2: 2 Kings xxiii. 8, etc.

6 Here too we read the fem. suf. חִבְּלָתֶךְ אִמֵּךְ and at the end of the verse יְלָדַתֶךְ (or with the SEPT., VULG., SYR. יְלָדְתֵךְ).

7 חבל here as well as in Ps. vii. 15 is taken by IBN EZRA and HITZIG in the sense of "conceiving" [so GENEV.: conceived]; but the meaning of writhing with pain, travailing (ὠδίνειν) is more obvious and better confirmed by חֵבֶל, חֲבָלִים. At all events, we must reject MEIER's explanation: "there thy mother betrothed thee" (in like manner SCHULTENS, J. D. MICHAELIS, MAGNUS) [so too PERCY, GOOD, WILLIAMS, BURROWES and others]; for even if the sense of pledging or betrothing were certainly established for the Piel of חבל, it would still require לִי to me, for its more exact limitation. The VULG. (corrupta est, violata est) with still less propriety has taken חבל in the sense of "corrupting" (in like manner AQUILA: διεφθάρη). On the contrary, the SEPT. correctly: ἐκεῖ ὠδίνησέν σε ἡ μήτηρ σου. [WICL.: there shamed is thy mother, there defiled is she that gat thee. DOW.: "there thy mother was corrupted, there she was deflowered that bare thee;" to which is appended the note: "under the apple tree I raised thee up; that is, that Christ redeemed the Gentiles at the foot of the cross, where the synagogue of the Jews (the mother church) was corrupted by their denying Him and crucifying Him."]

8 [MAT.: The church speaking to Christ.]

9 [WICL., COV., MAT., CRAN., BISH., DOW.: hell. GENEV., ENG. VER.: the grave.]

10 [WICL., DOW.: lampe. Other English versions: coals.]

11 In שַׁלְהֶבֶתְיָה the Masorah has connected the genitive יָהּ with the construct, as in מַאְפֵּלְיָה Jer. ii. 31, and as in proper names compounded with יָה or יָהוּ (the abbreviation of יְהוָה). The recension of BEN ASHER retains this mode of writing the expression as a compound, while that of BEN NAPHTALI separates the words. The φλόγες αὐτῆς of the SEPTUAGINT is based upon this contraction into one word. EWALD and HITZIG needlessly conjecture that the original reading was שַׁלְהֲבֹתֶיהָ שַׁלְהֲבוֹת יָהּ "its flames are flames of God." The analogy of the preceding sentences rather requires, as WEISSBACH correctly observes, the giving of two predicates to the single subject רְשָׁפֶיהָ. It is, therefore, properly to be translated "its flames are flames of fire, they are a blaze of God." On the etymology of שַׁלְהֶבֶת as a compound of אֵשׁ and לֶהָבָה compare WEISSBACH in loc. [The שׁ is servile, such as marks the Shaphel species in CHALD. and SYR. See GESEN. and FUERST's Lexicons. COV., MAT.: a very flame of the Lord. GENEV.: a vehement flame. ENG. VER.: a most vehement flame.]

7 Many waters cannot quench love,
and rivers shall not wash[1] it away.
If a man were to give all the wealth of his house for love, he would be utterly contemned.

SECOND SCENE:

SHULAMITH WITH HER LOVER (in the circle of her friends.)

(Vers. 8–14.)

SHULAMITH.

8 A[2] sister we have, little and she has no breasts;
what shall we do for[3] our sister in the day that she shall be spoken for?[4]

SHULAMITH'S BROTHERS.

9 If[5] she be a wall,
we will build upon her a silver castle;
but if she be a door,
we will stop her up with a cedar board.

SHULAMITH.

10 I[6] was a wall
and my breasts like towers.
Then was I in his eyes
as one that finds peace.—
11 Solomon[7] has[8] a vineyard in Baal-hamon.
He committed the vineyard to the keepers, each was to bring for its fruit
a thousand of silver.
12 My[9] vineyard, my own,[10] is before me;
the thousand is thine, Solomon, and two hundred for the keepers of its fruit.

SOLOMON.

13 Thou that dwellest in the gardens, companions are listening for thy voice;
let me hear it.

[1] שָׁטַף is neither "to deluge" (EWALD), nor "overflow" (DELITZSCH, HENGSTENBERG), nor "choke up" with sediment (ROSENM.), but "wash away, sweep away," as is shown by Job xiv. 19; comp. Isa. xxviii. 17 f.; Ezek. xvi. 9.

[2] [WICL.: The voice of Christ to the lineage of holy church. MAT.: Christ speaking of the church to the synagogue. NOTE IN GENEVA BIBLE: The Jewish church speaketh this of the church of the Gentiles. COV., MAT.: When our love is told our young sister, whose breasts are not yet grown, what shall we do unto her?]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. Some of the more recent interpreters dismember this last act, by attaching part of it to the preceding section, and regarding the remainder as an appendix or epilogue to the whole. Thus UMBREIT extends the last act of the piece to viii. 7, which is then followed by viii. 8–12 as a first appendix, "The shrewd old brothers and the naively jesting sister;" and viii. 13, 14 as a second appendix, "The unlucky trip to the country." In like manner RENAN, who regards the fifth act as ending with viii. 7, and the remaining seven verses as forming an epilogue. On the contrary v. HOFMANN connects vers. 5–12 with his last main division of the whole (vi. 1—viii. 12), and considers the last two verses only, vers. 13, 14, as an appendix.—DÖPKE and MAGNUS push the process of dismemberment to the greatest length, the former of whom divides this section into three separate songs (5–7; 8–12; 13, 14). The latter makes it consist of four small pieces, a lyric poem: "The parting" (5-7), two dramatic epigrams (8-10 and 11, 12), and a fragment with several glosses (13, 14).—A correct apprehension of the unity of this section as one whole, separated from the preceding by the solemn introductory formula מי זאת וגו "Who is this," etc., is found in EWALD, HITZ., DEL., HENGSTENB., VAIH., BÖTTCHER, WEISSB. Only some of these, especially the last named, go too far in their assertion of the compactness and continuity of the passage, since they fail to recognize the difference between the two scenes, which it unmistakably contains. For in vers. 5-7 there is evidently represented a return home, and in vers. 8 ff. a transaction after arriving home. The former of these paragraphs exhibit the principal couple of the piece as still travelling, although quite near the end of their journey. The latter depicts their acts and doings at home in the circle of Shulamith's family, where merry jests and peaceful enjoyment reign. The two scenes of such different character are therefore related exactly as in the third act; only there the excited tumult of the capital and the noisy bustle of the royal palace on Zion resounding with luxurious festivities, formed the background of the action, whilst here an innocent rural seclusion and simplicity, a cheerful, quiet life under apple trees, in gardens, and on mountains fragrant with spices, is depicted as a bright and peaceful termination of the whole matter.

2. With respect to the time and place of the action, no well grounded doubt can exist, on the supposition that the contents and meaning of the preceding act have been correctly understood. Solomon must have yielded to the urgent entreaties of his beloved, and immediately arranged a journey to her home and started with her, so that at the utmost there can only be an interval of three or four days between this and the foregoing act. Various indications suggest Shunem, the home of Shulamith, as the goal toward which the loving pair are journeying, and consequently as the locality of this act; especially the introductory passage, ver. 5, rightly understood and interpreted, and also the mention of Shulamith's little sister, ver. 8 f., her "abiding in the gardens," ver. 13, as well as the "mountains of spices" or "mountains of balm," ver. 14, which remind us of ii. 17.—Partly on account of the introductory words, which are identical with iii. 6, "Who is this coming up out of the wilderness?" partly on account of the masc. suffixes in עוררתיך, חבלתך אמך, etc. (according to the Masoretic punctuation), which appear to show that the passage refers not to Shulamith's but to Solomon's birth-place, WEISSBACH (as also DÖPKE, etc., before him) explains and assumes the royal palace on Zion to be the place of this action; vers. 5 ff. describe the arrival of the lovers there from the royal gardens (or more exactly from the "path or pasture ground of the royal flocks, which is to be sought between Zion and the king's gardens"); the rest of the action is then performed on Zion itself. But the correctness of the Masoretic reading in that passage is more than doubtful (see just below, No. 3); and it is only by the greatest forcing that all that follows, especially vers. 8 f., 11 ff. and ver. 13, can be brought into harmony with this transfer of the scene to Jerusalem, as is sufficiently shown by the strange combinations of WEISSBACH with respect to the circumstances, under which Bathsheba had borne Solomon "under an apple tree" and the way that Shulamith had "waked" the king on this his native spot, comp. on ver. 5 b.—The majority of recent interpreters are agreed with us in assuming Shunem to be the place of the action, only the advocates of the shepherd hypothesis, as might be expected, make not Solomon, but the shepherd and Shulamith arrive there and transact what follows;—a view, which is already sufficiently refuted by ver. 12 where Solomon is evidently addressed as present (see in loc. as well as on ver. 13), and which has as little foundation as VAIHINGER's assertion that vers. 5–7 is performed at the house of Shulamith's mother, and vers. 8 ff. "on the eastern slope of little Mt. Hermon," where her brothers may have had their pasture ground.—When DELITZSCH, whose view of the position and import of this act is in every other respect correct and appropriate, finds represented merely "a visit of Shulamith with her husband to her home," we must remark on the contrary that the entreaties and desires of Shulamith at the close of the preceding act certainly looked to more than a mere transient stay at her home, and that this was demanded by the whole state of the case.* It was only in an actual settlement both of herself and of her husband in her home that she could find the needed guarantee of an undisturbed continuance of her relation to him of cordial and conjugal love.

3. FIRST SCENE. THE ARRIVAL, VERS. 5–7.

Ver. 5. Who is this coming up out of the wilderness? So asked iii. 6 the "daughters of Jerusalem," the chorus of ladies of the court, who took part in the action until towards the end of the preceding act. This chorus could only have come to Shulamith's home in company with the royal pair; and then the question before us would be insupposable in their mouth† (vs. RENAN, etc.). EWALD, BÖTTCHER, HITZIG, DELITZSCH, etc. therefore correctly assume the speakers to be "shepherds," or country people, or "inhabitants of the district," whilst UMBREIT and MEIER arbitrarily suppose the question to be put by the poet himself; WEISSB. by courtiers on Zion, ROSENM. by citizens of Jerusalem.—מִדְבָּר lit. "place to which cattle are driven, pasture ground" (in opposition to cultivated land, comp. Isa. xxxii. 15; Joel i. 19; Ps. lxv. 13) is here used in a different sense from iii. 6 where it referred to the barren tracts north and east of Jerusalem. It is here a designation of the plain of Esdraëlon or Merj ibn 'Amir, lying southward from Shunem to Jezreel, which is still for the most part untilled and traversed by Bedouins (ROBINSON, Pal. II. 824, 862). For through this plain the travellers coming from the capital must ultimately pass.—Leaning upon her beloved. The long journey, though she may have got over part of it in her sedan, has wearied the delicate lady who therefore supports herself upon the arm of her husband. Failing to recognize this situation so clear in itself and so easily conceivable, the old translators have variously altered the sense of the passage. In this way we may explain the glosses to be found in the text of the SEPT. and VULG., λελευκανθισμένη (=מִתְבָּרֶרֶת) and deliciis affluens (=מִתְפַּנֶּקֶת), which are in both cases followed again by the correct translation of מִתְרַפֶּקֶת עַל־דּוֹדָהּ.—Under this apple tree I waked thee. The pointing עוֹרַרְתִּיךָ, like that of the following verb implies that Solomon is the person addressed and that Shulamith is the speaker, but the consonants admit also of the reverse, and the old Syriac version seems actually to have read fem. suffixes. Most of the older as well as of the more recent interpreters, following the Masoretic text conceive Shulamith to be the speaker, whilst HITZIG, BÖTTCHER (who to be sure assigns a part of the verse to Shulamith's mother), DELITZSCH, REBENST., SANDERS, etc. make her lover speak. In favor of the latter assumption it may be urged 1) that if Solomon were the person addressed, the absurd sense would result of his birth under an apple tree—a sense which is certainly not made any more tolerable by WEISSBACH's supposition of a "temporary sojourn of Bathsheba in the royal gardens with a view to her confinement;" 2) that in case the young shepherd were addressed the entire absence of any mention of his mother in what precedes, would be somewhat surprising and is not relieved by the parallels adduced by EWALD Gen. xxxv. 48, DONATI, vit. virg. c. 1, etc.; 3) that vers. 6, 7 confessedly spoken by Shulamith would require to be more closely connected with ver. 5 b than they actually are, in case ver. 5 b was also spoken by her: 4) that the expression "travail" or "conceive" (חִבֵּל) seems fitter in the mouth of a man than of a woman, in like manner as עוררתיך when correctly explained only appears appropriate in the mouth of the lover. For this expression, which we therefore read עוֹרַרְתִּךְ, as is shown by its likeness to תְּעוֹרְרוּ ver. 4, is not to be understood of a literal awakening out of sleep (EWALD, HEILIGST., HITZIG, VAIH. etc.) but of waking a previously slumbering affection, the stirring up of love. "I waked thee" is here equivalent to "I excited thy love, I won thy heart" (DÖPKE, DEL., HENGSTENB. etc.). The circumstance, to which Solomon here alludes, is manifestly identical with that described by Shulamith ii. 8 ff. We must, therefore, imagine the apple tree to be immediately adjoining the house of Shulamith's mother, and probably shading one of its windows; the following statement is thus too more easily explained.—There thy mother travailed with thee, there travailed she that bare thee. "There," i. e. not precisely under the apple tree as though the birth had taken place in the open air (DÖPKE), but more indefinitely, there, where that apple tree stands, in the dwelling shaded by it.

Ver. 6. Place me as a signet-ring upon thy heart. This is manifestly said by Shulamith in ardently loving response to what her lover had said to her, by which she had been reminded of the commencement of her relation to him. She thereupon presses familiarly and closely to him, illustrating the meaning of her words by a corresponding action. חוֹתָם the seal or signet-ring (Gen. xxxviii. 18) is here as in Jer. xxii. 24, and Hag. ii. 23 (which latter passage is probably an imitation of that before us) a symbol of close inseparable connection and most faithful preservation. Reference is had to the custom attested by Gen. loc. cit. of wearing signet-rings on a string upon the breast as well as to the like custom of binding them to the arm or right hand (see Jer. loc. cit., Ecclus. xlix. 11); not to the use of the signet-ring for sealing, as though the sense were "press me closely to thy breast and in thy arms" (HITZIG), and quite as little to the impression taken from the seal (HERDER, DÖPKE), or to an elegantly engraved bracelet (WEISSB.), or even to the high priest's breastplate (GOLZ, HAHN, etc.) For strong as death is love, hard as Sheol is jealousy. The request that he would keep her firmly and faithfully as his inalienable possession is here based by Shulamith on a reference to the death-vanquishing power and might of her love, or rather of love (אַהֲבָה absolutely), of true love in general. "The adjectives עַזָּה and קָשָׁה stand together also in Gen. xlix. 7 to designate the passionate anger and fiery zeal of Simeon and Levi as one which was too strong and invincible to be repressed. As our poet probably (?) had this passage in mind, he doubtless designed עַזָּה to be understood here too of the all-conquering power and קָשָׁה (literally hard, resisting all impressions) of the constancy of love which baffles every attempt to suppress or to extirpate it. The comparisons also tend to the same conclusion; for death overcomes all things and the nether world (hell, sheol) cannot be subdued, comp. Job vii. 9; Wisd. ii. 1; Matt. xvi. 18; 1 Cor. xv. 55." Thus WEISSBACH, who is substantially correct, only he goes too far perhaps, in regarding Gen. xlix. 7 as the model, which the poet designedly follows in this passage. On קִנְאָה zeal, zealous love, comp. Prov. vi. 34; xxvii. 4, where however the expression is used in a bad sense of love that has cooled, jealousy. In this passage it intensifies the idea of love, just as "death" and "hell" stand to each other in the relation of climax, and as "strong" (i. e. invincible) indicates a lower degree of the passion of love than "hard, unyielding" (i. e. inexorable, not to be appeased, like the realm of death, which never gives up anything that it possesses). Comp. HITZIG in loc.—Its flames are flames of fire, a blaze of Jehovah. On רְשָׁפִים "sparks, rays, flames," comp. Job v. 7 (בְּנֵי רֶשֶׁף "sons of the flame," i. e. sparks of fire); Ps. lxxvi. 4 ("flashes" or "sparks of the bow," i. e. arrows); Deut. xxxii. 24; Hab. iii. 5, etc. Love or rather its intenser synonym קִנְאָה (comp. Zeph. i. 18), appears here as a brightly blazing fire, which sends forth a multitude of sparks or flames into the hearts of men and thus verifies its invincible power and its inextinguishable intensity. And this quality belongs to it because it is not natural fire, but a "blaze of Jehovah," a flame kindled and sustained by God Himself. Observe that the name of God is mentioned only in this one passage of the Song, which must, however, prove to be just the radiant apex in the development of its doctrinal and ethical contents (comp. Doct. and Eth. No. 2). As parallels to this verse may be adduced: Motanebbi (edit. v. HAMMER) p. 8:

† [ZÖCKLER has repeatedly argued before that the recurrence of the same language implies the same speaker and the same subject: see his comment on iv. 1; iv. 6; vi. 9; vi. 10 and several times elsewhere. Whatever force there is in this consideration makes against the locality and the speakers that he here assumes. The wilderness here spoken of should not without some obvious necessity be regarded as different from that in iii. 6. And that the queen appears on foot leaning on her royal husband's arm is surely not suggestive of the termination of a long and wearisome journey.—TR.]

In the heart of the lover flames the blaze of desire Fiercer than the flames of hell, which are but ice in comparison.

Ver. 7. Many waters cannot quench love, and rivers shall not wash it away. It is here shown more particularly in what respect love is a divine flame, a fire greater than any kindled by a human hand, comp. 1 Kin. xviii. 38. To the figure of a blazing fire was readily added that of the inability of floods of water to extinguish this fire, and therefore in explanation of this new figure we need neither refer (as HITZIG does) to Isa. xliii. 16, a passage which is different in every respect, nor (with VAIHINGER and others) explain the floods of water of the enticements of Solomon in particular, by which he would have turned Shulamith away from her lover. The "rivers" (נְהָרוֹת) do not form a climax to the "many waters," as HÖLEMANN supposes (see e. g. on the contrary Jon. ii. 3); but in the latter case the thing chiefly regarded is the great mass of the element hostile to fire and in the former its rapidity and violence.—If a man were to give all the wealth of his house for love, i. e. with the view of exciting love and producing it artificially where it does not exist. Here we might really see something to favor the shepherd hypothesis, if a statement of the impossibility of purchasing true love was not appropriate in the mouth of Shulamith on our assumption likewise. But that this is the case, may be learned from the contrast between Shulamith's genuine, invincibly strong love for Solomon and the mere semblance of love which had previously subsisted between this king and his other wives; comp. the sentence referring to this very contrast, ii. 7; iii. 5; viii. 4, by which Shulamith represents to the ladies of the court how impossible it was for them by means of their amorous arts really to gain the king's heart (see on ii. 7, p. 63). On the expression comp. Num. xxii. 18; Prov. vi. 31, which latter passage was probably drawn from this. On אִישׁ "a man, any one," comp. Ex. xvi. 29. That it is here an indefinite subject seems the more certain from the fact that in the apodosis also a universal statement follows with an impersonal form of the verb (יָבוּזוּ לוֹ). VAIHINGER, HÖLEM., etc., therefore translate without good reason "If some man," etc.—He would be utterly contemned; lit., "contemning they would contemn him." The impersonal plural expresses, as in the similar passage Prov. vi. 30, the universal sentiment not merely that of those in particular who were solicited by false love and with money. The repetition of the verb by means of the Infin. absol. expresses the very high degree of contempt, which such an one as is here spoken of would encounter.

4. SECOND SCENE.—a. SHULAMITH'S LITTLE SISTER, vers. 8-10. WEISSBACH is alone in attempting to point out an intimate connection between these verses and the preceding. He says: "What was uttered ver. 7 c, d as a universal proposition (viz. that money and property have no value as compared with love) is now vers. 8, 9 conditionally illustrated in the sister who is still young and destitute of charms, whilst Shulamith represents herself, ver. 10, as the antithesis." As this view can only be based on a very artificial interpretation of vers. 8, 9, we shall have to abide by the looser connection maintained, e. g., by Delitzsch and Hahn. They suppose that the sense expressed by Shulamith, vers. 6, 7, of the high happiness which she possesses and enjoys in her love for the king, reminded her of her young sister who was still debarred from such loving enjoyment, and she accordingly expresses her solicitude for her future conduct and fortunes. Upon this assumption the unmistakable dramatic progress receives due acknowledgment without the sundering of all connection between the new scene which begins here and that which preceded it, as is the case, e. g., in Umbreit's view, according to which vers. 6, 7 constitute the closing sentiment of the drama (spoken by the poet himself) and vers. 8-14 a twofold supplement to it. So in the similar views of Renan, Döpke, Magnus (comp. above No. 1) and no less so finally on the assumption of Döderlein, Ewald, Heiligstedt, Meier and Rocke, that Shulamith narrates in vers. 8, 9 what had formerly been said by the brothers in relation to her little sister. In opposition to this latter opinion, according to which vers. 8, 9 are to be regarded as recitative, and Shulamith's own words do not begin again until ver. 10, Delitzsch correctly urges: "It would be vain to appeal to iii. 2; v. 3 to prove the possibility of this view; in both those passages the introduction of the language of another without any formal indication of the fact, occurs in the course of a narrative, whilst viii. 8 f. is only converted into a narrative by the "fratres aliquando dixerunt" (Heiligstedt) understood. There is nothing to justify such an insertion. The only seeming necessity for it might be found in vi. 9, according to which Shulamith herself appears to be the "little sister." It is not, however, said in vi. 9 that "Shulamith was the only daughter of her mother, but only that her mother did not possess or know her equal," (comp. in loc.). Hitzig, too, emphatically opposes understanding the passage as a narration, but assumes that both verses, ver. 9, as well as ver. 8, were spoken by Shulamith's brothers, which is contrary to the relation of the two verses as question and answer. Nevertheless this assumption, shared also by Vaihinger, especially if one brother is supposed to speak in ver. 8, and the other in ver. 9, would be far more tolerable than Böttcher's view, which makes Shulamith's mother put the question in ver. 8, and one of her sons answer it in ver. 9; or than the opinion of Hengstenberg that both vers. 8 and 9 were spoken by Solomon; or than the view of Starke, and of many of the older interpreters, that ver. 8 belongs to Shulamith, and ver. 9 to Solomon.

Ver. 8. We have a sister, little, and she has (as yet) no breasts. On קָטָן "little" in the sense of young, belonging to the period of childhood, comp. Gen. ix. 24; xxvii. 15; 1 Kings iii. 7; and in relation to the breasts as the criterion of virgin maturity, Ezek. xvi. 7.—What shall we do . . . . in the day that she shall be spoken for? The day that a maiden is sued for, is when she becomes of a marriageable age. The suit was addressed in the first instance to the father of the damsel, or to her brothers, not directly to herself (Gen. xxxiv. 11, 18; xxiv. 50, etc.).

Ver. 9. If she be a wall, we will build upon her a silver castle; but if she be a door, we will stop her up with a cedar board. Delitzsch correctly paraphrases these words: "If she opposes a firm and successful resistance to all immoral suggestions, we will build on her, as on a solid wall, a castle of silver, i. e., we will bestow upon her the freedom and honor due to her virgin purity and steadfastness, so that she may shine forth in the land like a stately castle on a lofty wall which is seen far and wide. But if she is a door, i. e., open and accessible to the arts of seduction, we will block her up with cedar boards, i. e., watch her so that she cannot be approached by any seducer, nor any seducer approached by her."—As soon as we suppose the brothers to give this answer respecting their younger sister, it loses the strange or even offensive appearance which its figures would certainly have in the mouth of Shulamith. Then, too, we shall not be compelled to seek for a closer connection between this sentiment and the main action of the poem (as the advocates of the shepherd hypothesis do), but can abide by the simple assumption that what is here said, as in general, all from ver. 8 onward, is simply designed to form a cheerful and sportive termination of the whole matter. Least of all need we take refuge in the over-refined view of Weissbach that ver. 9 is a continuation of the language of Shulamith, who supposes two questions to be put to her by certain men respecting her sister when marriageable, and immediately replies to them both—so that the sentences run thus:

. . . . What shall we do then in respect to our sister when they ask about her:
(a) "Is she a wall?"
Ans. We will build a little silver wall around her (?);
(b) "Is she a door?"
Ans. We will construct around her (?) a cedar frame (?)—.

As to the particulars observe further: The wall חוֹמָה is not designed to set forth the idea of lofty stature (קוֹמָה vii. 8), or the impossibility of being scaled, but simply that of the firm resistance which checks the further advance of foes (Hitzig correctly, vs. Weissbach).—The "castle of silver" טִירַת כֶּסֶף to be built on the wall is, of course, only to be conceived of as a small but strong castle, tower or bulwark (comp. טִירָה in Num. xxxi. 10; Ezek. xxv. 4, etc.), or if any prefer as a "pinnacle" or "battlement crowning the wall" (Hitzig, Heiligstedt, Magn., Meier, Hölem.—comp. the Sept.: ἔπαλξις),—not as a "palace" (Goltz) [so Eng. Ver.] or "habitation" (Hengstenberg), or "court-yard" (Böttcher), or "low fence" (Weissbach). The meaning of the figure is admirably illustrated by Hitzig by a reference to our proverbial form of speech, "He (or she) deserves to be set in gold."

He also not inappropriately suggests an allusion to the way that oriental ladies to this day decorate their head-dress with strings of silver coins or with horn-like ornaments of embossed silver and the like (comp. on iv. 4 above). On the contrary the sense which VAIHINGER would attribute to the expression is undemonstrable and in bad taste: "we will seek to obtain a large dowry by her." And WEISSBACH's explanation is perfectly absurd and trifling: "we will carry up a silver wall around her, who needs no such protection."—The door presents a fitting contrast to the wall, because it is easily opened and admits everything through it; an expressive emblem of unchastity which is open to every amorous seduction. "Stopping up" or "blocking" (HITZIG: "barricading") this door with a "cedar board" naturally means a determined warding off of those seductive influences, and rendering all dissoluteness impossible by the most sedulous care. By this is not to be understood a "fore-door or vestibule door in front of the proper door" (HUG), nor a "cedar post" (WEISSB.), nor a tablet to be put on the door as an ornament (HÖLEM.), but quite certainly a plank or board to be put against the door on the inside to prevent it from turning and opening. This board was to be of cedar, because this wood is a particularly strong building material and not liable to rot.*

Ver. 10. I was a wall and my breasts like towers. This is evidently said by Shulamith, whose thoughts were turned back to her own maiden state by her brothers' faithful care shown for the honor and purity of her little sister. Looking back upon this time, which now lies in the past, she can joyfully affirm that all seduction recoiled from her as from a solid wall, and that no one had dared to venture an assault upon her pure and awe-inspiring charms (her breasts as inaccessible and hard to be scaled as towers upon walls, comp. vii. 9 b).—Then was I in his eyes as one that finds peace, i. e., this careful preservation of my chastity, this keeping my charms pure and sacred procured me his, the king's, favor and inmost love. שָׁלוֹם "welfare, peace," is here as in אִישׁ שְׁלוֹמִי Ps. xli. 10, a synonym of חֵן "favor" or חֶסֶד "kindness" (comp. מָצָא חֵן Gen. vi. 8; xix. 19; Jer. xxxi. 2, as well as חֶסֶד וָחֵן Esth. ii. 17) and is not without a delicate allusion to the name of Solomon. There is also a certain refinement in the expression that Shulamith does not exactly say אָז מָצָאתִי בְעֵינָיו שָׁלוֹם "then I found peace in his eyes," but with a modest circumlocution: "then was I as one (כְּ as in כְּאָח viii. 1) that finds peace in his eyes," then I appeared to him worthy of his cordial affection (comp. DELITZSCH and HÖLEMANN in loc.). The expression contains no allusion, therefore, to the preceding comparison of herself to a wall surmounted by towers, or to a fortification. If the poet intended by אז הייתי בעיניו כמוצאת שלום to express the meaning: "then he finally left me in peace, instead of assailing me further," he did so in a most strange and unintelligible manner (vs. HITZIG), and to regard חוֹמָה "wall" as the subject of מוֹצֵאת "found" (EWALD, WEISSBACH) will not answer on account of this word being too remote; and such a form of speech as "a wall or fortress finds peace—it surrenders or it is spared," receives no confirmation from the Old Testament elsewhere, or from oriental literature generally.

5. CONTINUATION.—b. SHULAMITH'S INTERCESSION FOR HER BROTHERS, vers. 11, 12.—These difficult verses can only be explained in accordance with the context, and with the whole course and tenor of the piece, by assuming with DELITZSCH that the "vineyard of Solomon in Baal-hamon," mentioned in ver. 11, is simply adduced by way of example; that the speaker's "own vineyard," as in i. 6 (comp. iv. 12 ff.), is a figurative designation of herself and her charms, which she devotes to the king; and finally that the "keepers of its fruit" (ver. 12 b) is a designation of her brothers, the faithful and zealous guardians of her innocence; and consequently the whole must be taken to be an intercession of Shulamith on behalf of her brothers. This intercession fitly connects itself with their tender care for her little sister, just now manifested; and it likewise refers back in a suitable manner to the mention before made of her brothers, i. 6, and thus helps to bring about a termination of the whole, in which everything shall be satisfactorily adjusted and harmonized. We therefore reject the following divergent explanations of this brief section: 1) Shulamith declares that she has herself guarded her virgin innocence better than Solomon his vineyard in Baal-hamon, whose keepers had secretly retained, besides the fruit, two hundred shekels for themselves; she therefore needs no other keepers, not even the guardianship of her brothers (HERDER, UMBREIT, * [THRUPP quotes in opposition to the view above given of this verse the language of RENAN: "This interpretation is pressed by serious difficulties. I do not insist on its vapid and feeble character. We may admit contrary to all probability, that the silver battlements of which the brothers speak might denote a sort of ornament as a recompense of the young girl's virtue, it will still remain a trait whose signification is an enigma. If the brothers wish to punish their sister in case she should commit any fault, why do they menace her with panels of cedar? It is evident that this implies an idea of riches and luxury. Battlements of silver, panels of cedar answer to one another. Neither of these alternatives includes an idea of punishment or recompense." THRUPP himself supposes it to be the language of the bridegroom, and its meaning to be: "We will build her up, and that in full glory. The walls and the doors come into view as two of the most obvious features of every edifice. As for her wall of enclosure, we will fence her around with silver; as for her doors, of cedar alone and of no inferior wood, shall they be constructed." BURROWES: "Her nature should be adorned with ornaments, giving more beauty and strength than turrets of silver, or a richly carved door of the most elegant cedar." MOODY STUART: "They liken the little sister to two of the principal parts of a building or temple—first, the wall without which there is no stability, no house; and second, the door without which there is no entrance to the house, and no use of it. The wall is the image of stability on which, with its solid strength, is to be built a silver palace for habitation and for beauty. The door is the image of accessibleness; but a door-way without the wooden frame work, requires cedar boards to distinguish it from a mere open thoroughfare." GOOD understands by the "silver turrets:" "The prominent charm of an ample dowry shall immediately be her own;" and by the "door encased in cedar:" "She shall be the graceful entrance to my favor and friendship." HARMER, who supposes the little sister to be Pharaoh's daughter espoused to Solomon, imagines that the "wall" and the door" are emblems of the political consequences of the alliance as on the one hand "a guard and defence, giving a new security to Judæa," and on the other opening "a free communication between Egypt and the Jewish country."]

DÖPKE, HITZIG, ROCKE). 2) Shulamith protests that she disdains all the wealth and the treasures of Solomon, which, like his vineyard in Baal-hamon, he is obliged to entrust to the guardianship of others; her vineyard, i. e., her innocence and virtue is under her own control, and in this possession of hers she has enough (DATHE, ROSENMUELLER, EWALD, HEILIGSTEDT, etc.). 3) Shulamith triumphantly relates that Solomon offered her the rich vineyard at Baal-hamon, whither she had been carried to his pleasure-palace, with all its produce, and the entire park as her own property, if she would be his; he was even willing to release her from the payment of the two hundred shekels due to each of its keepers; but she had renounced the whole for the sake of her lover, who now, as her own chosen vineyard(!) stood before her (VAIHINGER). 4) Shulamith means to say, Solomon must have his distant vineyard in Baal-hamon kept for him, and must therefore pay away considerable of its proceeds; but she, on the contrary, kept her own vineyard, that is to say Solomon (!), herself, and hence possessed his love alone without being obliged to share it with others (HÖLEMANN). 5) Shulamith intends by Solomon's vineyard in Baal-hamon herself, and by her own vineyard the shepherd, her lover; she means to say, Solomon did indeed get Shulamith into his power at Shulem (=Baal-hamon), and offered her one thousand shekels by each of the ladies of the court as her keepers; but he may keep this money, for her proper keeper, the shepherd, now stands before her again (MEIER). 6) Shulamith means to say that Solomon, who has let out his vineyard to keepers, receives as the owner one thousand silverlings in cash from each keeper, whilst the keepers retain for their pay five times as much in fruit = five thousand shekels. But Shulamith, who keeps her own vineyard, i. e., herself with all her personal charms, and consequently might, as both owner and keeper, retain the entire produce for herself, gives the use of the fruit, consequently the five parts, in this case = 1000 (!) to Solomon, and only retains for herself as keeper the 200, i. e., the possession; the usufruct shall be his, she will only be the keeper of her vineyard (WEISSBACH). 7) Solomon's vineyard in Baal-hamon denotes the kingdom of God founded in the midst of the world, in the midst of the savage masses of heathen population. The keepers of this vineyard are the several Christian nations, each of which has to pay one thousand shekels to the heavenly Solomon as the product of his labor. Each must therefore produce as much fruit as the people of Israel, the tenants of the vineyard mentioned, ver. 12, which forms one part of the great vineyard of the Church. Each people then receives in return a reward of grace of two hundred shekels, that is to say, a fifth part of the produce of his portion; and the people of Israel receives no more, comp. Matt. xx. 1–16 (HENGSTENBERG). 8) Solomon's vineyard at Baal-hamon denotes the Church of the Lord in the midst of the world. Its keepers are the prophets, apostles, pastors and teachers of Christendom, to whom two-tenths (twice as much, therefore, as under the Old Testament) shall be given as a reward of grace for their faithful raising of fruit, or for their leading many thousand souls to the heavenly Solomon (CALOV, MICHAEL., MARCK., BERLEB. BIB., and in general most of the old allegorists). 9) The vineyard at Baal-hamon denotes the Gentile world generally, Shulamith's vineyard, ver. 12, Japhetic gentilism as one half of this Gentile world, the two hundred silverlings the spiritual peace granted by the king to Japhetic humanity in regard for their loving submission to him, *etc. (HAHN).

Ver. 11. Solomon has a vineyard in Baal-hamon. Baal-hamon is, without doubt, the place not far from Dothaim in the south of the tribe of Issachar, which is called Βελαμὼν or Βαλαμὼν, Judith viii. 3, a locality therefore not very remote from Shunem. It derived its name from the Syro-Egyptian god, Ammon הָמוֹן (=אָמוֹן Jer. xlvi. 25), which may have been worshipped there, just as Baal-gad (Josh. xi. 17; xii. 7, etc.) was named from Gad, the well-known Babylonish god of fortune. Baal-hamon scarcely signifies "the populous" (VULG., WEISSB., etc.), and it is still more improbable that it is to be identified, as many of the older writers assumed, with Baalbec in Cœle-Syria (where vineyards could hardly ever have flourished), or with Hammon, חַמּוֹן, Josh. xix. 28, or with Baalgad, Josh. xi. 17, etc. But if that locality near Shunem is intended, it by no means follows that Shulamith had been carried off to just that spot by Solomon, and detained there for some time as a prisoner in a pleasure-palace of the king, as VAIH. strangely supposes. But Shulamith only names this vineyard as an instance very near her home of a royal property let out on high rent, in order afterwards to illustrate by it her relation to the king as well as to her brothers.—He committed the vineyard to the keepers—i. e., to several at once, amongst whom the piece of ground was parcelled out in greater or smaller portions. That these keepers rented the property is shown by what follows.—Each was to bring for its fruit a thousand of silver—i. e., a thousand shekels of silver. From the high rent may be inferred the productiveness of the property; for that its annual yield corresponded to the agreement is certainly presupposed, as well as that a part of the produce of his piece annually remained for each tenant—that is, on an average, about two hundred shekels (see ver. 12).

* [GOOD finds in these verses a request made of Solomon by his royal bride that he would "consign the estate which, prior to her marriage, she had possessed in Baal-hamon, and which now appertained to himself as a part of the dowry she had brought him, to her younger and unendowed sister." BURROWES: "While Solomon's tenants were obliged to pay the stipulated rent, the spouse speaks of a vineyard which was her own, but which she would nevertheless so keep under her own control and management, as to be able while paying the keepers equitable wages, to offer yearly to the king a thousand pieces of silver as a testimonial of her love." MOODY STUART: "Solomon is the Messiah, and Baal-hamon is no doubt either Jerusalem or the land of Israel. The vineyard was let to keepers, who were to render its fruits to the king—they were to render them, but the silence as to the fulfilment implies that the covenant was not kept. The New Testament church now declares, that by the Lord's grant the vineyard is hers, and undertakes, through grace, that she will never lose sight of it. She further engages to assign to those who labor in it a suitable and moderate maintenance, and allots 'two hundred pieces of silver to those that keep the fruit of it.' At the same time she promises that the full revenue shall only be the Lord's, and that she will never attempt, like her predecessor, to claim the vineyard as her own." The same author also calls attention to the "remarkable agreement between this passage and the reference to the Lord's vineyard, in the fifth chapter of Isaiah," and adds: "The Song of Solomon was evidently much in the mind of Isaiah, and he refers to it more or less directly in every page of his prophecies." This last statement is verified through several pages filled with passages from Isaiah, which bear more or less affinity in language or ideas to expressions in the Song of Solomon. The interesting relation thus suggested as existing between these two books, has its importance in determining the estimate put upon the Song of Solomon, and the interpretation given to it in Old Testament times and by inspired men.—TR.]

Ver. 12. My vineyard, my own, is before me—i. e., I take charge myself of my own vineyard, viz., of myself and my womanly charms, of myself as an object of men's admiration and courtship. Since I came to maturity, I have been my own keeper, and have with entire freedom transferred to my royal husband this right of mine to dispose of myself. I have no longer any other keepers but him, who is one with me (comp. on i. 6, p. 56).—The thousand is thine, O Solomon, and two hundred for the keepers of its fruit—i. e., the entire proceeds are due to thee; I remain wholly thine own with all that I am and have. But they who kept my fruit, i. e., my innocence and virtue, before I was thine, should not go empty away. These trusty brotherly guardians of my maidenhood, who once watched over me as they now faithfully and sedulously watch over our little sister (ver. 9), must be commended to thy love and favor, as in my heart they hold the next place after thee. —This explanation, it is true, does not completely remove all difficulties; but it involves fewer doubtful and forced assumptions than the other attempted explanations adduced above.

6. CONCLUSION.—c. THE CHEERFUL PLEASANTRY AND SINGING OF THE ROYAL COUPLE, vers. 13, 14 — These two concluding verses contain, according to HERDER, the fragment of a conversation; according to UMBREIT the serenade of a young man from the city with the answer of his lady-love in the country; according to DÖPKE a "small duet" belonging to the initial period of Shulamith's love, and here appended by the poet; according to MAGNUS, a glossed and mutilated fragment of a love-song; while most of the advocates of the shepherd hypothesis see in it a colloquy between the lover and Shulamith, consisting of an invitation to sing on the part of the former, and a song of a roguish and playful character, which Shulamith thereupon sings (EWALD, HITZIG, VAIHINGER, etc.). This last view evidently has the most in its favor on account of the recurrence of הַשְׁמִיעִנִי "let me hear," from ii. 14, and the unmistakable resemblance of the song in ver. 14 to ii. 17 (and partly also to ii. 15). Only there is no reason to suppose the person, who invites her to sing and whom Shulamith addresses in her song as דּוֹדִי "my beloved," to be a young shepherd. The epithet which he bestows upon her, "thou that dwellest in the gardens," makes it seem far more likely that he was a citizen of rank, and even resident in a palace, a man of royal race exalted greatly above her station in life. But little reason as there is to regard another than Solomon as the "beloved" who speaks in ver. 13 and is then addressed in the sprightly little song, there is quite as little for assigning this occurrence with HITZIG to a period considerably later than the one recorded just before, or for assuming with BÖTTCHER that the bridegroom, in quitting the merry engagement feast in the house of Shulamith's mother, wanted to hear one more song from his bride before he left her for the last brief interval prior to the celebration of their marriage. DELITZSCH and WEISSBACH understand the passage correctly, only the latter preposterously imagines the locality of the action here as in the final section generally to be the royal palace in Jerusalem (comp. p. 127).—Thou that dwellest in the gardens.—Literally, "thou sitting in the gardens," i. e., thou resident in gardens, who art opposed to living in populous cities and splendid palaces (comp. i. 16 f.; iv. 6; v. 7; vii. 12 ff.). Solomon here evidently means to allude with pleasant raillery to the fact that his beloved, who had so often before exhibited her longing for the gardens and meadows of her home, was now exactly in her element, and ought therefore to be in the best of moods.—Companions are listening for thy voice; let me hear it.—The חֲבֵרִים "companions" are, according to MAGNUS, "neighbors," or "the family;" according to HUFNAGEL, "female friends;" according to MOLDENH., EWALD, REN., etc., "bridemen" (des paranymphes, RENAN); according to VAIHINGER, "shepherds, fellow-pasturers;" according to WEISSBACH, Solomon himself, who here jestingly represents himself as a shepherd, or rather in the plural as "shepherds!" and finally, according to HERDER, HUG, DELITZSCH, "playmates" or "youthful associates" of Shulamith. This last view has most in its favor; only it is a matter of course that the companions of Shulamith's youth were likewise those of her brothers; they are consequently in all likelihood shepherds and country people from Shunem and its vicinity. They were probably, therefore, the same as the speakers in ver. 5 a of this chapter; on the contrary they are not the companions of Solomon (comp. v. 1), of whom Shulamith spoke i. 7 (vs. EWALD).

Ver. 14. Flee, my beloved. The words sound like sending off, or if any prefer "scaring away" or at least "urging out into the open ground" (DELITZSCH). They do not, however, by any means express seriously intended coyness, as is shown by the very form of the address דּוֹדִי "my beloved." They rather invite to hasten and range with the singer over the mountains and plains as is shown by what follows. ברח is not, however, exactly equivalent to "hasten, up!" as is maintained by VAIHINGER and WEISSBACH, who refer to Num. xxiv. 11, Isa. xxx. 16, etc. For even in these passages, as well as in Gen. xxvii. 43; Am. vii. 12, the primary signification of this verb "to flee" is clearly apparent. EWALD arbitrarily: the meaning is that "he should cut across, leave his companions and not stay opposite to her but hasten to her side," etc.—And be like a gazelle, etc. comp. on ii. 17. In place of the "mountains of separation" or "cleft mountains" there mentioned we here have balsam mountains or "heights of scented herbs" (WEISSBACH), which to be sure are meant in a different sense from iv. 6. Shulamith here calls by this name the mountains and hills of her home (comp. ii. 8) because they were just then in the season of spring or early summer covered with fragrant flowers of all sorts and accordingly filled with balmy odors (comp. ii. 12 f., vi. 11).—On the import of this verse as the conclusion of the entire poem, comp. DELITZSCH, p. 153: "Amid the cheerful notes of this song we lose sight of the pair rambling over the flowery heights, and the graceful spell of the Song of Songs, which bounds gazelle-like from one scene of beauty to another, vanishes with them."

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The allegorical exegesis is in this section less able than ever to bring all into a form possessing unity and regular structure, and to reach really certain results, as the attempts above exhibited (p. 132) to give an allegorical explanation of vers. 11, 12 have evinced. Not only in this passage but in other parts of this section this mode of interpretation shows a very great multiplicity and divergence of opinions among its various advocates. The "little sister," ver. 8 f. is by some made to denote the first-fruits of Jews and Gentiles received into the church immediately after the ascension of Christ (CASSIODORUS, BEZA, GREGORY, RUPERT v. DEUTZ, etc.); by others the entire body of the Jews and Gentiles yet to be converted (HEUNISCH, REINHARD, RAMBACH, likewise HAHN, who refers it particularly to "Hamitic Gentilism"); by others the weak in faith and young beginners in Christianity belonging to every period of the church in their totality (MARCK., BERLEB. BIB., STARKE); and finally by others the daughter of Zion at the time of the first beginnings of her conversion to the heavenly Solomon (HENGST. and others). "The wall and the door," ver. 9, are indeed mostly understood of the steadfast and faithful keeping of the word of God and of its zealous proclamation to the Gentiles (according to 1 Cor. xvi. 9, etc.); but some also explain them of the valiant in faith and the weak in faith, or of the learned and simple, or of faithful Christians and such as are recreant and easily accessible to the arts of seduction. And then according to these various interpretations the "silver bulwarks" are now the miracles of the first witnesses of Jesus, now the distinguished teachers of the church, now pious Christian rulers, now the testimonies of Holy Scripture by which faith is strengthened, etc. And again by the "cedar board" are sometimes understood the ten commandments or the law, sometimes Christian teachers, sometimes the examples of the saints, sometimes the salutary discipline of the cross and sufferings for Christ's sake, etc. (comp. STARKE in loc.). By the "companions" or "associates" who listen for the voice of the bride, ver. 13, PISCATOR in all seriousness understands God the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost; whilst the followers of COCCEIUS for the most part referred it to the angels; some of them, however, to true Christians; and the two most recent interpreters of this class suppose that the Gentile world before the time of Christ is intended by the expression, but with this difference that one (HAHN) has in mind chiefly the Gentiles as hostile to revelation, the other (HENGSTENBERG) as kindly disposed to the people of God and His revelation.

2. It is apparent from the exegetical explanations given above, that this divergence in the allegorical exegesis is matched by an equal variety of opinions and uncertain guess-work on the part of the merely historical interpreters of this chapter; and in fact it is scarcely possible by even the most cautious procedure to arrive at perfectly certain results in respect to the meaning and the connection of the sentences of this section with their fragment-like brevity and obscurity. This, however, only makes it the more necessary with a view to its practical application to adhere to its leading and most perspicuous passage which formulates the fundamental thought not only of the closing act, but of the entire poem with solemn emphasis and with an elevation and pathos of language purposely rising to a climax. We mean the spirited encomium contained in vers. 6 and 7 of love between man and woman as a mysterious divine creation, and a power superior to death, Shulamith's exalted panegyric of conjugal and wedded love, the culminating point of the entire poem, and the only true key to its meaning according to the unanimous assumptions of interpreters of all schools. DELITZSCH (p. 182 f.) has given the best exposition of the thought contained in this leading passage, which has in it the gist of the whole matter: "Shulamith herself here declares how she loves Solomon and how she wishes to be loved by him. This spontaneous testimony discloses to us the intermingling of human freedom and of divine necessity in true love between man and woman. Love is a שַׁלְהֶבֶת יָהּ, a flame kindled by God Himself. Man cannot produce it in himself, and though he employ all his wealth for the purpose, he cannot kindle it in others. She is speaking, of course, of true love, which is directed to the person and not to any mere things. Man cannot create this love by his own agency. It is an operation of God—a divine flame, which seizes upon a man like death with irresistible power, and can neither be quenched nor extinguished by any calamity or by any hostile force. There is thus evinced in true love an inevitable and invincible power of divine necessity. But this divine necessity has for its other side human freedom. It is the inmost and truest ego of a man, from which this divine flame of love blazes forth. Whilst a man becomes a lover by a resistless divine energy, the lover's passionate desire for the possession of the beloved object is as vehement and inflexible as the resistless and all-devouring grave. The lover loves because he must, but love is at the same time his most pleasurable volition, a return of love his most ardent desire. Smitten with love to Shulamith Solomon exclaims: How beautiful and how comely art thou, O love, among delights (vii. 7); and smitten with love to Solomon Shulamith prays: Place me as a signet upon thy heart, as a signet ring upon thine arm (viii. 6)." In this declaration of Shulamith, which gathers up all the main elements in the idea of wedded love and experience, and accordingly formulates the fundamental thought of the entire poem there is no allusion indeed to the blessing of children as the resplendent consummation of the wedded communion of man and wife, as also no express mention is made of this matter elsewhere throughout the piece. For to see an allusion to it in what Shulamith says, viii. 12, of the "thousand" due to her husband from the produce of his vineyard, would evidently be forced and arbitrary. But DELITZSCH properly remarks in relation to this omission of an apparently essential particular: "The author of Canticles has avoided everything, which would look to an externalizing of the relation, which he describes. He makes no mention of children; for a marriage in which the parties who conclude it are not an end to each other, but merely a means for obtaining posterity, does not correspond to its idea. Children are by divine blessing the sparks which result, when the flames of two souls flash into one. The latter is the main thing in marriage." It is also a delicate feature of great psychological as well as æsthetic value, that Shulamith, the chaste and pure-minded maiden, though silent respecting the blessing of children, mentions instead with tender love and solicitude her little sister and her brothers, the same who had previously been angry with her and treated her harshly (i. 6), and consults with her brothers respecting the future of the former and in her intercession with her royal husband lays to heart the future of her brothers. This overplus of love, which with all the ardent fervor of her devotion to her husband, she still preserves for her own family (see viii. 12); this touching sisterly love, which is essentially identical with her faithful and pious filial devotion to her mother repeatedly shown in the previous portion of the Song; this combined with her gladsome, cheery, playful disposition, which expresses itself in her concluding words, adds the finishing touch, sweetly transfiguring this noble picture which the poet would sketch of her character as the ideal of a bride and of a young wife, and by which—an unconscious organ of the Holy Spirit—he has set forth the idea and mystery of marriage itself as a sacred and divine institution.

3. From this luminous and revered female figure there proceeds a transfiguring radiance, in which the form of her royal husband, the enthusiastic admirer and spirited singer of her love and her loveliness also shines with a clear and pleasing light. But yet for the sake of a complete and thoroughly correct typical estimate of the transaction, the sad truth must not be left out of the account, that the bond of love so purely and holily regarded by her was nevertheless at last desecrated and broken by him. For that this was the case, can scarcely be doubted from the manner in which both the historians of the Old Testament record the final fortunes of Solomon and the end of his life (1 Kin. xi. 1-43, 2 Chron. ix. 22-31). Of a sincere and permanent conversion of this monarch to a God-fearing and virtuous walk in the evening of his days neither the book of Kings nor Chronicles has anything to relate, the latter of which would scarcely have omitted to note a similarity in the life of Solomon to that of Manasseh in this respect. That no proof can be drawn from the book of Ecclesiastes for this view, a favorite one with many of the older theologians, the introduction to this book may teach us (§ 4). We must stand by the assumption confirmed by 1 Kin. xi. and contradicted by no other testimony, that the unhappy king afterwards proceeded from that stage of polygamous degeneracy indicated in this Song, especially in vi. 8, to still grosser extravagances in this direction, and thus at last filled up the measure of his sins, and brought upon himself and upon his house the corresponding judgment beginning with the revolt of Jeroboam. He must accordingly have deeply wounded Shulamith's heart by a speedy return to the criminally voluptuous and idolatrous manners of his court and have repaid her love so pure and ardent with base infidelity. This deplorable condition of things casts a light not very creditable to him upon his relation to his antitype in the history of redemption, the Messiah. Love for the purest and best of the daughters of his people, whom he adorned with the crown royal and raised from an humble station to the throne of David, could not permanently purify and hallow the earthly Solomon and rescue him from the abyss of crime into which he was in danger of sinking. The heavenly Solomon, on the contrary, must laboriously lift the Church, which He is gathering to Himself from amongst mankind, step by step to the luminous elevation of His own holiness and truth; He must have great indulgence for her weakness, must pardon her many relapses into her old walk of sin, must absolutely despair of presenting His bride perfectly pure, without spot or wrinkle, so long as she remains in this present world. In the Old Testament type, therefore, we find a sad contrast between the fidelity of the wife and the unfaithfulness of her husband. Of the Messianic archetype, on the other hand, it is written with perfect truth: "Though we be unfaithful, yet He abideth faithful; He cannot deny Himself" (2 Tim. ii. 13). In the type no really pure, complete and durable realization of the idea of marriage is reached, but the natural relation existing for a time is only too speedily perverted to its opposite by the fault of the husband. In the fulfilment of the type it is the husband, the new Adam, the Son of Man who came down from heaven and yet is essentially in heaven (John iii. 13), who not merely concludes the marriage covenant with mankind, but likewise preserves, confirms, refines and conducts it step by step to its ideal consummation, which is at the same time the palingenesia and perfection of humanity. To our human consciousness this parallel, which strictly carried out leaves scarcely more than a faint glimmer of resemblance between the type and the archetype, has in it something deeply humiliating. But it may nevertheless operate to the strengthening of faith in our heart, for it points us to the one divine helper and physician, who heals all our diseases; it drives us into the arms of the one mediator and comforter, who is rich in mercy unto all them that call upon Him; it encourages us to childlike confidence in the heavenly author and finisher of our faith, whose grace worketh all in all according to His word of promise (John v. 15; Phil. i. 6; ii. 12, etc.).

His love no end nor measure knows,
No change can turn its course,
Immutably the same it flows,
From one eternal source.
